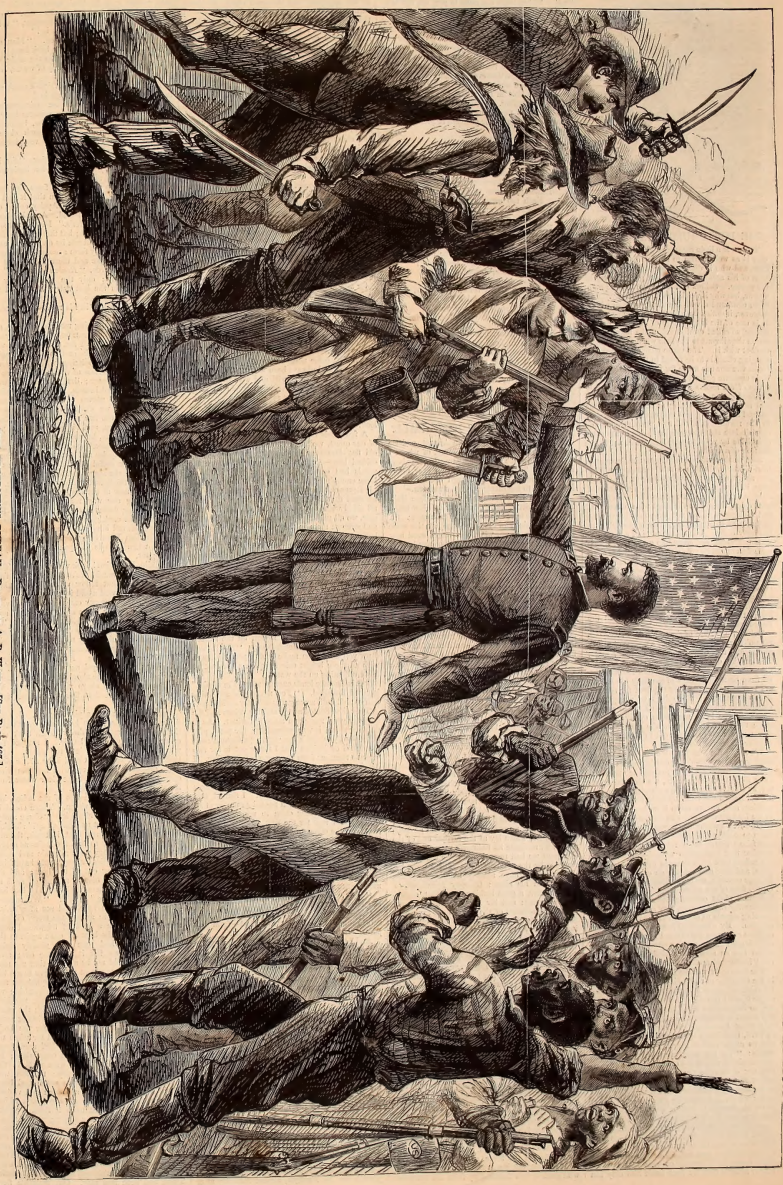
The Siamese Twins—Chang and Eng—after living in very close proximity for nearly sixty years, have come to the determination to submit to a surgical operation to divide the ligament which binds them together. The reason of their resolution is said to be the fear that one of them may be the subject of a disease which will prove fatal to both. Whether a successful operation can be performed is no new question, the surgical world having discussed it long ago. But science has advanced rapidly within the last half century, and the Twins contemplate visiting Paris for the purpose of practically learning what can be done for them. They are now living on a farm in North Carolina.

A new style of bonnet, of great elegance, has just been received from Paris. There is no need to go to milliners—each lady can easily make it herself, and therefore we give the "recipe" for the "Ophelia bonnet," as it is called. Take ten or fifteen roses, or any other flowers which you fancy; twine them into a wreath; place it upon your head, and the exquisite creation is a bonnet. If your tastes incline in that direction, you may substitute fruit for flowers; a garland of blushing cherries, and bunches of currants artistically woven with fresh leaves, are quoted as the height of the fashion. If you choose strawberries or raspberries, be careful and select those that are not too ripe. The wild Azalea, or the mountain laurel, is appropriate for the season.

There is a prize for somebody in one of the large Meriden manufactories, if somebody can only find it. A fascinating and immensely wealthy young lady is working, by her own choice, as a common operative there. She carefully conceals the knowledge of her wealth, wears unassuming clothes, and differs in no outward respect from those by whom she is surrounded. The reason for this eccentricity is that she is waiting for some interesting young man to woo and win her "for herself alone." What a rush of young men to Meriden there will be!



The beautiful town of South Reading, Massachusetts, combined its patriotic observance of the Fourth of July with a formal celebration of the adoption of its new name of Wakefield. The names of the towns called South Reading, North Reading, and Reading have led to so much confusion in the transmission of mail matter, and freight, and articles by express, that the inhabitants have been almost unanimous in their desire to adopt a different title. A wealthy citizen, Mr. Cyrus Wakefield, having recently made a gift to the town of money for building a new town-hall, the name of "Wakefield" was suggested and adopted; and the town commenced its existence under its new name on the Fourth. Pleasant and appropriate exercises were held during the day.

Lake Memphremagog is one of the most enchanting bodies of water in the world, and it indicates exceeding good taste in the great sea-serpent, which is reported to be located in its waters, that he has chosen such a charming abode. There is an abundance of room for the monster to spread himself and swim in, luscious trout to satisfy his appetite, and the scenery upon the banks and vicinity is beautiful enough to delight the most insensible creature.

"Carleton," in the Boston Journal, writing from Mocha, begins to tell his readers about this great Arabian coffee port, and how coffee is raised in the interior and brought down on camels, and how delicious is the flavor of Mocha coffee, when suddenly he breaks off from his subject, declaring it too painful, in these days of burnt beans, brown bread, roasted corn, chiccory, and carrots, to think of those good old times when every body knew that breakfast was ready by the delicious aroma which exhaled from the coffee-pot in the kitchen.

THE PORTUGUESE MAN-O'-WAR.

There is a little creature which sails the ocean who is as well known to mariners as the North Star, and who is distinguished both by the boldness of his seamanship and the great beauty of his person. Sailors call it the Portuguese man-o'-war, but why it would be difficult to say. It is often confounded with the nautilus, from which, however, it differs both in genus and appearance. It is one of the large family of Medusæ, or sea-nettles, so called on account of the burning sensation they impart to the skin when they come in contact with it. The cause which produces this stinging effect is to be found in the provision the Great Creator has made for the protection of the little creature against its foes. Concealed in the tubes of the feelers with which it is abundantly furnished is an acrid substance, which the animal is capable of ejecting at will, though some natural historians assert that contact is necessary to the manifestation of this phenomenon, and even declare that the stinging is due to the actual incision by points in the feeler, and not to the ejection of a fluid.

Seen on the surface of the water the Portuguese man-o'-war looks like a semi-transparent bladder, about six to ten inches long at the water's edge, its form upward being that of a quadrant of a circle. This quadrant is generally of a whitish-blue color, fringed at the edge with a beautiful and delicate pink, or not unfrequently with an ultramarine blue, that is gradually blended with the body color. The quadrant is of a membranous character, and looks like a shell, for which it is often mistaken; its sides are somewhat compressed, and descend from a narrow apex to a base varying from two to four inches in breadth. They are also crinkled, or ribbed, so as to allow of a reduction of sail at the will of the creature—for the membranous quadrant is as a sail to the Medusa, and, being exposed to the wind, seems to drive its owner along faster than the fleetest yacht.

Below the surface of the water the Portuguese man-o'-war is seen to consist of a bundle of brown feelers and tubes that look like so many roots. The function of these is manifold: some of them act as feelers or look-outs, to guard the bold vessel from harmful cruisers of the fishy kind; others serve to seize the prey required for the Medusa's sustenance; and others as grapplers or anchors, by which it can fasten itself to any object. In the large specimens of this Medusa these roots stretch far below the surface of the water, where they straggle out in the fulfillment of their respective functions.

Whenever the weather is too rough to allow of the Portuguese man-o'-war continuing his course without danger, or when an enemy too powerful to be fought heaves in sight, the singular creature, by what is apparently a muscular action, lays his sail flat on the water, quickly furls it in that position, and, having taken it in, lets out the air in the bladder which acts as its float, and allowing itself to become dead-weight, sinks rapidly down to depths where the curiosity of man can not follow him. As a rule it is only in fine weather that Portuguese men-o'-war are seen; the sailors look upon them as the harbingers of calm, and they may be seen on occasions sailing in large convoys, the most picturesque little craft on the face of the whole ocean.

Should night overtake them while they are prosecuting their voyage, they are prepared with warning signals to other navigators to keep clear of them. By a beautiful provision of their Maker these creatures are enabled to make the whole of their sail luminous with a phosphorescent light, which has an appearance kindred with that of the "ineffectual fire" of the glow-worm.

The precise duty of the Portuguese man-o'-war in the economy of nature is not well ascertained. Its relatives, other Medusæ, form the chief food of the whale; but this one, though its dimensions are no larger than have been already stated, is too large for passage down the narrow gullet of that great Cetacean. Richard Ligon, writing in 1673, beautifully speaks both of the creature and its unascertained function in the following words: "Yet this great master-piece of nature (the whale) is not, in my opinion, so full of wonder, nor doth raise the consideration to such a height as this little fish, the curvil, who can when he pleases enjoy himself with his neighbor fishes under water, and when he puts on a resolution to try his fortune in another element, the air, he riseth to the top of the sea, let the billows go never so high, and there, without the help of a sailor, raises up his main-mast, spreads his sail, which he makes of his own sinews, fits his rudder and ballast, and begins his voyage; but to what coast he is bound, or what traffic he intends, himself and He that made him only can tell. Fishes there are none to prey on, nor flies, and therefore it is not for food he travels. I have seen them five hundred leagues from any land. If his voyage be to any port, he must have a long time and much patience to go thither; if to sea, he's there already. In one thing he hath the advantage of any ship that ever sailed, for he can go nearer the wind by a point than the most yare friggot that ever was built, which shows how far nature can exceed art. Another advantage he has that in the greatest tempest he never fears drowning. Compass nor card he needs not, for he is never out of his way. Whether, then, his voyage be for pleasure or profit, we are yet to seek."

THE GOLDEN TEMPTER.

One had wealth, another beauty;
Oh, 'twas hard indeed to choose;
Either prize was worth the winning,
Each too great by far to lose;
One was rich, and one was handsome—
Wealth was ugly, Beauty poor;
Beauty maketh Wealth more wealthy,
Wealth increases Beauty's store.

"Rob the one, and wed the other;"
Silence, tempter, get thee gone;
What are both, devoid of honor?
Worse than either when alone.
Conscience is not bribed by riches,
Wealth is not a salve for crime;
Crime will stain the soul forever,
Conscience rack you in your prime.

Limbs to labor, brain to guide them,
Health to keep them firm and strong;
And a lass, brimful of beauty,
Are a fortune to the young.
These are mine, and shall I leave them,
Cozened by deceitful gold?
Get thee gone, thou bold deceiver,
Tempt me when I'm getting old.

THE TRAGEDY AT MERE HALL.

It was a golden afternoon in August, and we were a party of eight on the Mere, of whom I was the eldest, the others being mostly giddy boys and girls. They will none of them ever forget that afternoon, I think, though each of them should live to see threescore years and ten.

When on the Monday we met at Mere Hall, which our friend, Lady Ashleigh, had just taken on a lease, we were all strangers to each other. St. Leger De Maine and I laughed together, this same Thursday afternoon, when we remembered how we had come down from town, three days before, in the same carriage, had read our respective papers, and had never uttered a word, like true Englishmen, during four mortal hours. For here were we, on the Thursday, already intimate friends. Miss Vivien Galway was also in the train, and I, who knew her by sight at London balls, felt rather alarmed when I found her alighting at the Mere Hall station. So fashionable a young lady would, I thought, spoil all our simple pleasures in the country; she turned out to be the life and soul of the fun—until that fun came to a sudden and untimely end.

Our charming hostess had only been at Mere Hall a few days when we arrived; it was all new to her, the people on the estate and in the neighborhood unknown, the very park itself unexplored. It was a sweet old place, much neglected by reason of the impoverished fortunes of its owner, overgrown with mosses, and its garden choked with weeds, but affording ample accommodation for twice our party in its endless bedrooms, furnished in faded chintz and peopled with many generations on its walls. On the strength of certain festivities in the neighborhood Lady Ashleigh had bidden us down here, though she was, of course, any thing but settled in her new home; but Rosalind, her lovely little daughter, was of an age and of a temperament to enjoy every thing, and for her sake this impromptu party was got up. Rosalind it was who, this afternoon, after luncheon, proposed that we should go down to the Mere, which lay at the further end of the park, and navigate its unknown waters in a certain punt we had remarked among the reeds as we rode by the previous day. There were, besides those I have already mentioned, young Apsley and his sister; Georgey Fynchden, of the Fusileers, a good-looking, impudent, engaging youngster; and Sir Reynald Vavasour, the oldest and soberest of the party, next to myself. All the heads of the families had been expressly invited to stay away; it was a party of boys and girls brimming over with good spirits, among whom I felt I must seem a very slow coach, for I could neither swallow sixpences and bring them out of my boots, as St. Leger De Maine did, nor walk round my own head twenty times without falling flat on the ground, like Georgey Fynchden, nor catch gooseberries in my mouth when they were thrown at me ten yards off, like that expert young Apsley. I could only sketch; and, unless I caricatured them all, this mild accomplishment was incapable of bringing any grist of fun to the common mill. Yet they were very long-suffering with me, I am bound to say; and sweet Rosalind, especially, with her pretty little ways, tried to make me feel that I was not a cumbersome appendage to this joyous band. We walked across the park, through green herbage, topped with tall, feathery grasses, which became a sheet of tremulous silver as the sun shimmered along their edges. Then through a wood of firs, whose branches interlaced against the sky, where white-tailed squirrels were leaping from bough to bough, and the ground was carpeted with the resinous fibre of the trees overhead. At length we came to the edge of the Mere, and here we looked to find the boat, but it was nowhere to be seen. A wild duck or two fluttered up from the bulrushes at our approach, and skimmed along the glassy water, leaving a pearly ripple in their track; there was nothing else in sight. But the Mere was a mile and a half round, with many a creek and hooded cove, where the boat might have drifted and now lie unseen. We resolved to walk round, and, if possible, find it. There was a roughish path along the water's edge, now over big pebbles, now through high weeds and brambles, with the wide-armed elms leaning over, here and there, till they touched the water; the steep bank of wood running up almost perpendicularly from it in places. Georgey Fynchden, who was in front, had just propounded some riddle, apropos of the bulrushes, about Moses (the most prolific character for such jeux d'esprit in Sacred Writ), when Vivien Galway, who was next him, suddenly stopped and exclaimed, in a stage whisper, "Good gracious! Look there—under that tree—is it the melancholy Jaques? Come, Rosalind, you ought to know; are we going to act As you like it? If it isn't Jaques who is it, sitting by the water's edge in that attitude? Look, he doesn't even raise his head when he hears us."

We were, in truth, close beneath the fallen trunk on which the man in question was sitting, high up, upon the bank, but just where an opening in the trees gave an uninterrupted view over the greater part of the lake. He had nothing on his head, and his hair, which was of a light brown color and abundant, was in the wildest disorder; but we could not see his face, which he kept buried in his hands. He was dressed in a shooting-jacket, and part of a fishing-rod lay beside him on the bank.

"What business has he here?" said Fynchden. "Who is he? I vote we ask him."

But Miss Ashleigh suggested that it was, in all probability, some neighbor or tenant of her mother's, who had always been accustomed to wander about the place at will, and with whose prescriptive rights Lady Ashleigh would be sorry to interfere without first making inquiries.

"He is a very queer-looking fellow," said De Maine, as we walked on. "I don't half like his look."

A few yards further we came upon the object of our quest, wedged in among the rushes. An old flat-bottomed boat, which had apparently drifted here—for it was not moored where the weeds had caught it. Was it safe? Was it large enough to hold us all? I declared not, but Sir Reynald, the next senior in command, stoutly asserted that it was; and the juniors of course all sided with him. As it was wet and dirty inside, we all gathered armfuls of grass and leaves, and strewed them in the stern of the boat for the ladies to sit on. Then the three skipped in, and squeezed themselves and their gay striped petticoats into the narrowest possible space; and the four young fellows jumped in after them, Fynchden seizing the long punting pole, and Apsley the one dilapidated oar. From no selfish pusillanimity was it that I hesitated to follow; but really the crazy old tub looked already dangerously full: another human being would, I thought, make "the cup o'erflow." I therefore resisted Miss Ashleigh's kind supplications that I would not desert them, and seating myself on the water's edge, I drew out my sketch-book. "No; I must draw you all. You make such a pretty picture, with all those bright colors; quite a bouquet of flowers floating on the water."

"It is distance lends enchantment, I'm afraid," laughed Rosalind. "You never said any thing half so civil until some yards of water divided us."

They then floated away, and the voices and the laughter grew more and more indistinct. As to drawing them, it was impossible; the punt, propelled by Fynchden's long arms, performed such wonderful evolutions that I never got it for two seconds together from the same point of view. I had just shut my book in disgust, when I heard a step behind me. The boat was by this time nearing a long, narrow promontory of rough stones on the opposite side of the lake. I turned, and found the stranger we had passed a quarter of an hour before standing close to me. His face, which I now saw for the first time, was deadly pale, and the effect of ghastliness was increased by a recent cut upon the cheek, where the blood was scarcely yet dry. The sweat stood out in great drops upon his forehead, and I observed that his hand trembled nervously as he spoke.

"Call to them to come back, Sir. Tell them not to—not to go out there, will you?"

"Why? Isn't the boat safe?" I exclaimed, starting up. "Does it leak?"

"No—yes—yes, it isn't safe. For God's sake call to them to come back from that—from that point. Shout to them, Sir, won't you?"

And I shouted; for the man's agitation was so great that it conveyed to me some vague sense of imminent danger, though the obvious question rose to my lips immediately I saw the boat's head, in answer to my signals, swing round,

"But if the boat isn't sea-worthy, they had better land on that side instead of recrossing the lake?"

"Any where but there—let them land any where but there! Let them recross the lake—let them land any where but there!"

"Have you been in the boat yourself, to-day?"

He gave me a terrified stare, like a wild beast brought to bay. "No, I have not been in it. No one can say I was in it. I defy them to prove it. I mean," here he pressed his hand to his head, and moaned, "if there is any—any—any thing amiss with the boat, I didn't do it."

I now made up my mind that the man was mad, and this conclusion, though not altogether a pleasant one, as we stood together on the water's edge (and the man was a head and shoulders taller than I), relieved my anxiety somewhat as to my friends' peril, they being still some distance from the shore. But any personal apprehension, if I entertained it, was quickly dispelled; for the stranger, almost instantly after this, turned upon his heel, sprang up the bank, and was quickly lost among the trees. I could now hear Fynchden's voice, shouting, "What's the row? Do you want to get in?"

"Boat isn't safe," I bellowed. "Man says, shore there dangerous. Come back here."

"Tell him he's an idiot!" was the reply.

"The punt hasn't let in a drop of water," cried De Maine.

Then rose the chorus of girls, "We won't come back, unless you promise to get in."

It was the only way to secure their return, so I promised; and three or four minutes later the old punt, with its cargo of blithe, boisterous, young spirits, ran up on the beach close to where I stood. I told my story very impressively, as I thought.

"Depend on it," said Fynchden, "the lout was drunk. Did you ask him what business he had in the boat at all?"

They pulled up some boards from the boat's bottom, to verify their assertion that it had not made a drop of water, when Apsley called out, "Hallo! look what I've found. A pocket-book! It must be that mad duffer's." He was not scrupulous as to examining it; but there was no name on the first page to indicate its owner. A number of entries—chiefly farm accounts, apparently—were scrawled here and there throughout the book, and the words, "Reuben owes me," occurred constantly; only the sum steadily increased until, in the last entry, it reached upward of seventy pounds.

"There is method in his madness, at least," laughed De Maine.

They insisted on getting me into the boat, and disposed of me somewhere between Sir Reynald Vavasour's legs, where I sat, crunched up, with my knees in my mouth, and my head hanging over the boat's side, stirring, with the bulrush that I held, the marvels of the little deep, as we lazily clove the water; dragon-flies, and wondrous many-winged insects, forests of tiny pink-eyed weeds, and groves of red-brown water-mosses. Anon, we came to shallower water, and I could see the fine sandy bed of the Mere, starred with green, and violet, and golden pebbles, fitted together, here and there, by the cunning hand of nature, into shapes of tesselated pavement. Tadpoles and minnows darted across from under the awful shadow of the punt as we advanced, but the bigger fish all kept to the deeper and weed-thickened portions of the Mere.

We were now at the lower end of it, and began working our way round by the opposite shore, floating dreamily on, like the Lotos-Eaters, under the cool, green light of the overhanging, large-leaved boughs. Some one struck up the Canadian Boat Song, and we all joined in chorus, when I broke in upon the harmony by calling out,

"Hallo, Fynchden! look where we are. Turn the boat's head round; we're not fifty yards from the very point that fellow warned me against. We may just as well avoid it, you know."

"Stuff! what danger can there be? I vote, on the contrary, we make straight for it;" and, disregarding my sapient voice, on we went. The water, though still translucent, was much deeper as we neared the stony tongue of land which advanced into the lake some thirty yards beyond the bank on either side. I called out lustily to Fynchden not to propel us any more with his long pole, lest haply he should drive in the boat's bottom upon some sharp point of rock. We were now not more than five or six yards from the promontory.

Suddenly there was a piercing cry. It came from Miss Galway, who had been hanging on the boat's side, and now threw herself back, covering her face with her hands. I stooped forward and looked down into the water. Good God! What was it? Could it be...?...a face, livid, distorted, staring up, with horrible wide-open eyes at me, through the clear water from the stony bottom of the lake.

Most of the men, and two of the ladies, had had the same horrible vision. There could be no doubt, no question about it. "Come away! For Heaven's sake, let us come away!" shrieked Miss Galway; and I saw that, in truth, the first thing to be done was to land the ladies as speedily as possible. They were all pale and trembling. I thought Miss Galway would have fainted as I handed her out of the boat; and the scene of terror and dismay natural on such an occasion I need not here detail. "You had better go home at once," I said. "We must—some of us—remain here, and see after this." They turned away in among the trees, clinging to each other like a herd of frightened deer, while we pushed the boat off once again to the spot where we had seen that ghastly sight. There it was—we felt it with the oar; and, though there could not be a doubt that the man was dead, the most urgent matter was to get the body at once out of the water. Fynchden and Apsley threw off their coats and jumped in; we in the boat held the pole and the oar, to which they clung with one hand, while with the other they lifted the body. It was not without some difficulty they succeeded in this, for the body was very heavy; a fact accounted for when we found that the pockets were filled with large stones. Life had been extinct some time; he was quite cold. The hands were rigid in the convulsion of their death-agony; the face was awful to behold. Whether or not it had been evil in life, the horror of a sudden and violent death had scared it with an expression which none of us who looked upon it then, I think, will ever forget. He was a short, powerful man; from his dress apparently a well-to-do farmer. Who was he? What was his history? How did he come by his end? We had all one impression. The look stamped on the features did not belong to suicide. Yet the pockets filled with stones showed that this was no accidental death. There had been foul play. Our thoughts flew from approaching this very spot—the man whose wild demeanour had led me to believe him to be a maniac. We held a brief consultation; and Aspley was dispatched to the keeper's lodge, half a mile distant, and Sir Reynald volunteered to return to the Hall, and send off a messenger to the nearest police-station, while the rest of us kept guard over the body. We laid it on the bank, spread a handkerchief over the face, and sat down together in silence.

The August sunset was dropping its great golden flakes upon the Mere: the purple twilight was stealing up from the sombre masses of the park woods; it was an impressive scene, in the unbroken calm of the summer's evening, contrasting harshly with our thoughts and feelings as we sat there, beside a murdered man, whose life was unknown to us, whose death was a mystery. My speculations thereon were interrupted by Frenchie's touching me on the arm. He pointed, without speaking, to the opposite side of the Mere. Under the shadow of the trees I could just dimly perceive a tall man running stealthily along: it was too far to identify it with certainty, but I had little doubt that it was that of the man on whom the thoughts of us all were turned at that moment. He disappeared among the trees, and we saw him no more. A quarter of an hour later, we were joined by the keeper and several of the laborers on the estate. They at once recognized the dead man as Richard Boyce, the tenant of the Mere Hall farm. He was the elder of two brothers, whose father had rented the farm for many years, and held the reversion of the lease to this Richard, subject to certain charges in favour of the younger son, Reuben. The latter, who lived with his brother, had annually helped him, was but a poor creature in his way, who supported his brother by his idleness, and did nothing toward their common welfare. Farming was almost his only occupation, and, though better educated than Richard, an indomitable indolence prevented his turning his acquirements to any account. He was generally good-tempered, and bore his share of brutal jokes and attacks with wonderful patience; but he had been known occasionally to break out, and his violence then was stated to have been very great. He was said to be indebted to his brother in a considerable sum, and Richard had more than once threatened to eject him from the farm. On the other hand, Reuben had denied the justice of this claim, and had declared that it was not in his brother's power, under the circumstances of his father's will, to turn him out of the farm, as long as he chose to remain there. He further alleged that, shortly after the latter's death, he had himself given a large sum of money to his brother for investments on the farm; and he, in consequence, held himself to be entitled to some share in the profits from the same, not a penny of which had he ever received. It seemed doubtful whether he could bring forward any proof of this, for he was no man of business; some believed it, and some did not; one thing was clear—there was bad blood between the brothers. I need not say that the full description of the dead man's brother we at once detected the man we had seen—the man on whom all our suspicions were now fully rested. Something tended to strengthen these. There was now evidence of a probable motive for the commission of the crime, for the men to carry the body to the farm, where it was arranged that some of us should await the arrival of the police, while the others returned to inform Lady Ashleigh what had passed. Fortunately there was no wife, no child, nor near relation to whom the intelligence had to be broken: a couple of aged servants, who had known the dead man from boyhood, were the only occupants of the farm. Reuben was absent, they said, and had been so since about one o'clock, when there had been high words between the brothers. Something of the quarrel had been overheard. These had been in explanation and recrimination; bitter and insulting taunts from Richard had been replied to with more warmth than usual by Reuben. He had been called a beggar, a dependent on his brother's charity; he demanded now to be repaid the money he had given to Richard; then he would go. The quarrel waxed yet more violent, but the servants could not give a very clear account of what passed after this; as indeed, in a hasty and angry altercation, it is difficult to do. Rich and suddenly rose, and went out in the direction of the lake; his brother shortly followed him with his rod; he had not been seen since. A magistrate, resident in the neighborhood, who was riding by, and heard what had occurred, now appeared, and, on the arrival of the head of the police, the coroner was at once communicated with, while a summons was issued for the apprehension of Reuben Boyce, on suspicion of being concerned in the death of his brother.

During all this night, and the next morning, the search for him proved fruitless. In the mean time the coroner's inquest sat on the body, and returned an open verdict of Found Drowned. And yet, I believe, the fact of Reuben's having absconded left no reasonable doubt on any one's mind of his guilt. In the afternoon I learned that he had, at last, been caught hiding in a wood some miles distant. He was found in great want of food and from evident distress of mind; but he offered no resistance, manifested no surprise, proffered no explanation. He appeared, indeed, to be mentally, as well as physically, thoroughly worn out; the state of cerebral excitement under which he had shown himself to me, having been succeeded by a prostration so complete as to deaden the memory, if not the conscience. I was, of course, present when he was examined, and gave my deposition as to what had passed between the prisoner and myself on the edge of the Mere. He seemed scarcely to hear what I said; shook his head when asked whether he had any questions to put to me; and, when urged by the magistrate, in the kindest manner, to state if he was innocent, and support that statement by any evidence he could adduce, he only sighed deeply, and murmured that he believed his mind was gone from him: he could remember nothing. It seemed to him that his brain had been on fire: he supposed that he must have killed him.

"That's it," whispered De Maine to me. "He is not such a fool as he looks. You'll see, the man who defends him on the assizes will pull him through on the score of insanity."

Before committing the prisoner to jail the magistrate asked whether any further evidence was forthcoming—the deposition of the two servants having been taken. A policemen here said that there was a laboring man at Stoke, with two boys, his sons, who said that they knew something of the matter; and two intelligent-looking lads, of thirteen and eleven, were brought in.

I transcribe what followed as correctly as I can. I noted down the lads' evidence in their own quaint Dorset at the time, though I wish not to burden it that I made no note of the case.

"We a-zeed Maister Boyce, Bill an' me did, when we were i' the wood. We a-zeed en come down to the Mere, an' take to punt, what Maister Reuben fishes in mos' days. Zoo when Maister Reuben come, it wer' a-gone, an' we heard en a-call to punt a-back, an' begun to fish from th' bank, till Maister Boyce 'e come wi' the punt, an begun a-callin' an niames, an' wiped his punt wi' the bank, an' then 'e went a-perin' Maister Reuben. Aone hét en on's face, an' maade en bleed; an', hot-like, he picked en up an' a-drowed en in the Mere. Maister Boyce 'e a-ducked his head, an' somehow 'e a-vell right for'ard i' th' water, an 'cause 'e th' stunnes an's pawket, I reckon, 'e a-stayed under water. Maister Reuben gin' a git cry, an' seemed struck all o' a heap. I coulden reach en, 'cause in this place th' pon's a-deep, an' I can't a-bide the yauls fro' the bank. We wer' that a-feared, we dussen't stir; an' Maister Reuben, 'e run away like's if 'e wer' foolish, after a-hidin' the body in the punt."

"And why did you give no alarm?" Why did you keep all this to yourself until now, pray?"

The magistrate asked this question somewhat severely, and the elder boy—the spokesman—flung his head back. The younger one, with a burning cheek, at last took courage, and answered what was unintelligible to me, until it was translated.

"Coz wa was anutten what we didn't ought."

The magistrate himself looked puzzled for a moment, whether the sergeant of police, with promptitude, explained that the witnesses had been stealing nuts in the Mere Hall woods, and had, therefore, kept quiet for fear, to come forward and state what they had seen; and the two young conscientious smiting them, when they learned how Reuben was suspected of murder, they revealed all to their father.

As to the accused, he had been listening to this evidence with unmoved attention, and not a face which I shall never forget. With the first words the boy uttered it seemed as though the blood began slowly to drift away from his troubled brain. The cheek kindled into a little spot of color, the deadened light of the eye revived, the nostrils came slowly to dilate. As the boy spoke, the whole of that scene—the facts of which, I am confident, had completely faded from his memory—must be unfolding to him; nothing but the horrible impression of them remained—the whole of that tragic scene returned to him with vivid distinctness, and he uttered no tears. He seemed to wish to speak, but it was some minutes before he was sufficiently recovered to do so. At last he said in a low voice:

"What you have heard, Sir, is the truth. I know it all now: my brain has been troubled. This is how it happened." He used words about money, and other things, Ae and I. He was—he was a fool, Sir, I can't say any thing against him now; but he was always kind to me, and in the Mere, and shouldn't use the boat again. He had taken the oars and found it gone, and him in it, I was angry, because I knew I had as good a right to it as him, and that he had taken it to go to the Mere. He was going to fish from the bank, until I saw him at the Point [this] and pockets with stones. I guessed what he was after. In a minute I saw he shoved in a bit nearer to me (out away in the deep water, below ever), and began blackguarding me, and pelting me with stones from his pocket. I kept my patience as long as I could, at last one cut my cheek open; and I picked it up and shied it back. He ducked his head; the stone fell into the boat close to him; and he—there was a plunge, and a yell, and he was gone, Sir! My God! I shall never forget it. I couldn't have saved him if I'd tried, for I can't swim; but I don't think—may God forgive me!—that, for the first moment I wished it: the next, I would have given any thing—any thing to have brought him back to life. I had killed him—it seemed to me so—and Cain's brand was upon me. My brain whirled round—it seemed on fire. I thought I was going mad. I didn't know what I was about, but I ran round the lake, as far away from the spot as possible. My hope, I think, was that the body would never be discovered; for no one ever used the boat but myself—ever went on the lake. I nearly died of hunger, therefore, when I saw the boy get into the boat—which had drifted to the opposite bank—and row toward the very spot. I knew how clear the water was. I tried, like a miserable fool, to prevent their going there. I scarcely know what I said to this gentleman; it was all of no use. I remember watching the boat after this, and seeing them bring up the body; and I remember nothing more. I believe I ran away into the thickest part of a distant wood, where they found me."

In the manner, not less than to the weak, impressionable character of the young farmer, who had received a somewhat unusual amount of education for one of his class, but whose mental line, never of the strongest, had given way before the sudden pressure of this catastrophe.

It was scarcely possible for circumstantial evidence to be stronger than it had been in this case; and how easily may one be misled by even far weaker? This was the moral that we drew from the unlooked-for result of that morning's investigation. This man—rendered when a net-work of circumstances was so strongly woven—whose story was so improbable, that, even had his memory been unclouded, the truth, told by him, would never have been believed; this man, whose demeanor, not less than the weight of evidence, seemed so conclusive against him, would assuredly have been tried at the next assizes, and found guilty of Manslaughter, but for the testimony of those two small eye-witnesses to the truth. Alas! how many an innocent more than we have been sacrificed for want of such!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE LATEST DEFINITION OF "MAN."—A tele-graphic universal animal.

THE RITUALISTS AND THE CHURCH OF ROME.

A church where Ritualists do congregate,
Extreme unction—woo—man under repentance,
Goes but one day, a workman to his mate,
Then no pulpit, but his proclamation.
"I publish banns of holy matrimony
Which this very Sunday and she of Rome—
Know'st thou just cause against the splice, old crony?
Of course not—what! you fly your reason—come!
To do forbid the banns," the mate replied—
"There's one impediment—it would be wrong
To splice to such a bridegroom such a bride,
And this is why—She never saw a kiss."

An ill-looking fellow was asked how he could account for Noah's forming him up. "Nature was not to blame," said he, "for when I was two years of age I was the handsomest child in the neighborhood, but, even then, to escape herself upon my parents, for some fancied injury at their hands, one day dropped me over for another boy belonging to a friend of hers, whose child was rather plain."

CONCERNING BONNETS.
Said Sally, when some one criticised
His pretty wife's new bonnet,
"She has so little on her head,
She's bare much open it."

HANG IT ALL.—The chances of the abolition of capital punishment—in Ireland, at least—would seem to be remote. Whenever the Legislature hanged one or two Fenians already, and now it is proposed to suspend the whole Irish Church.

A man, in telling about a wonderful parrot hanging in a cage from the window of a house which he often passed, said, "I cross 'Stog third' so naturally that every time I hear it I always stop!"

The following compliment was paid by a dentist to a lady. He had made several ineffectual attempts to draw out her decayed tooth, and, finding at last he must give it up, he resigned by saying, "The fact is, Madame, it is impossible for any thing bad to come from your mouth."

The young lady who sang, "I wish somebody would love me," has had her wish gratified. Eleven offers to his have arrived, and intend to stay all the summer.

A clergyman of indifferent character, going to read prayers at another village, found great difficulty in putting on an old-fashioned surplice. "I think," said he to the clerk, "my head is in the surplice." The astonished clerk stared until the parson got the garment on, and then sarcastically exclaimed, "I think so how he is, Sir!"

IRISH EPITAPH.
Here lies Lady O'Looney,
Great niece of Burke, commonly called The Sublime.
She was bland, passionate, and deeply religious.
She also painted in water-colors,
And sent several pictures to the Exhibition.
She was first cousin to Lady Jones,
And died full in the Kingdom of Heaven.

TO MAKE A YOUNG LADY LOVE YOU.—Tease her to love some one else.

A little six-year-old was sitting in repose, one evening, upon the parlor steps, with a basket in his hand, gazing intently at the moon. "Pa!" he suddenly spoke, "is there only one man in the moon?" "What's the matter, my son; the man in the moon is the only inhabitant of that bright world we have ever heard of. After a moment's pause he remarked, with a sigh, "Well, I'm sorry he's lonesome, pa, and no one to play base ball with!"

A MODEL HUSBAND.

He walks out with his wife on a week-day, and is not afraid of a milliner's shop. He even has "change" when asked for it, and never frets or sulks afterward. He is not above carrying a large bundle or a cotton umbrella, and even holding the baby in his lap on a railroad car. He runs on first to knock at the door when it is raining, and goes outside if the rain is fair. He is very kind first in cold weather. He gets up in the night and rocks the cradle or nurses the door-bell. He is never in hysterics, and is melted instantly by a tear. He patches up a quarrel with a sweet grace, and never throws the sulks with a trip to the Central Park. He never lies on a sick-room bit lozenges, or buys bonbons to supper. His clothes never smell of tobacco. He reads the latest novels, and never takes to afterwards. He never invades the kitchen, and would no more think of "showing my" the cook-stove than of ordering the dinner. He is innocent of a latch-key. He is the family go-at of town once every year while he remains at home with one knife and fork, sits on a brown Holland chair, sleeps on a cotton bed, and has a char-woman to wait on him. He is very happy and affectionate, keeping the wedding anniversary punctually.

NOT QUITE SUITED.

Pitts is a fast man, a sharp man, a business man, and when Pitts goes into a store to trade he always gets the lowest cash figures, and he is well. Pitt took about, and if I don't find any thing that suits me better, I'll call and buy some of you."

Pitts is partial to women, and young ones in particular. Now, pitts was lately Pitts to Boston, and am getting rather long in years, and guess I'll get married."

His fearless qualities would not let him wait, so he at the levee, and, calling upon a lady, opened the conversation by remarking that he would like to know what sort of husband she should be getting—and so on. Mr. Pitts, that is an affair in which I am not so very much interested, and I prefer to leave it to you," said she. "But" says Pitts, "you are interested; and, my dear girl, will you marry me?"

The young lady blushed very red, hesitated, and finally, as Pitts was very well to do in the world, and morally, financially, and politically, of good standing in society, she accepted him, whereupon the matter of fact Pitts responded, "Well, well, I'll look about, and if I don't find any body that suits me better than you, I'll come back."

A French woman once said that she never loved any thing "like her second young children," repeated a friend. "When they were little," she replied, "and you love diamonds?" "Oh, dear, yes, when they are large!"

IN THE MELTING MOON—The weather.

HINTS FOR MODEL BELLES.

Always "have a bad cold" when you are asked to sing.

Always cry at a wedding, but don't faint.

Don't be too "accomplished" if you don't like your partner.

Never falsi notes a gentleman stands near enough to catch you before you have had time to fall.

When you go shopping always take ma along to carry the bundles.

Flirt a good deal.

If ps does bad grammar, and is rather queer and values, always him out of the room before the company arrives at your evening parties.

Always refuse the most perfectible man the men do not want to marry the woman, but a bundle of dry-goods.

If he asks you to ride once make it a regular habit, and spoil the woman for any good and useful purpose un ter the sun, for you are sure to do it.

A conceited coxcomb, with a very patronizing air, called out to an Irish laborer, "Here, you bog-trotter, come and tell me the difference between you and I will treat you to a glass of whisky." "By my word," said Pat, "an' you'll know's a-goin' to drink."

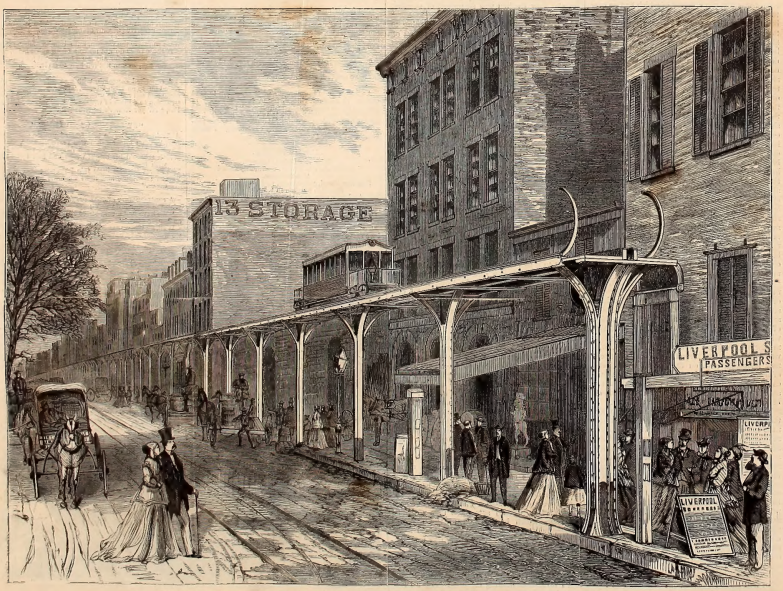
"SWEETNESS AND LIGHT."

A fly in some treacle had feasted until he
Had blinded himself and was perfectly silly.
Then down in the oil in a manner not neat,
Which scorch'd his bright wings and half kill'd him with heat.

The moral for this little tale I propose is—
"Even sweetness and light we must have in small doses."

A contemporary opens a grave article on explosives with the following words:

"We have had a committee sitting for several years on the question."



Well, all we can say is that, considering the material, we wonder they haven't long ago furnished a report.

WARM IN THE CARS.

This is how our friend Isaacs escorted those charming Girls to Long Branch.

SCENE IN PRINTING-HOUSE SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.
[SEE PAGE 477.]

ELEVATED RAILWAY IN GREENWICH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.
[SEE PAGE 477.]

SCENES IN PRINTING-HOUSE SQUARE.

IMMEDIATELY in front of the Times and Tribune offices in Printing-House Square there are to be found on all days, and almost at all hours, a motley congregation of street peddlers, auctioneers, etc., and their customers. One frequenter of the Square owns a telescope, with which he invites passers-by to view the heavens at the small cost of five cents: another has a pair of scales, on which, for the same sum, one can learn his weight; others have various patent machines for testing and trying the lungs; while there are others with paper, pea-nut, and various other stands. The scene, as portrayed on page 476, presents a phase of metropolitan life not uninteresting to the city or country reader.

THE ELEVATED RAILWAY.

A TRIAL trip of the new elevated railway in Greenwich Street was had on July 3, and the rapid speed which was attained on that occasion leads the friends of the enterprise to hope that the problem of rapid and safe locomotion through the crowded streets of the city has been solved. Our illustration on page 476 will give the reader an idea of this new style of railway. It is now in running order from the Battery to Cortlandt Street, and, with the present machinery, the cars can be propelled, with little jar and oscillation, at the rate of fifteen miles an hour. This speed was attained on this occasion; but the experiment thus far has developed many facts and improvements which will be added, and thus enable the projector to run the cars at a much more rapid rate.

This work was begun July 2, 1867, $100,000 being subscribed for the experiment. The State Commissioners on July 1, 1868, reported in its favor, declaring it a success, and the Governor authorized the completion of the road from the Battery to Spuyten Duyvil, and the work is to be at once hastened to completion. The Directors promise to finish it to the Thirtieth Street depôt of the Hudson River Railroad by the first of 1869.

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR.

THE Republican Convention, which met at Syracuse on July 8, nominated HON. JOHN A. GRISWOLD, of Rensselaer County, whose portrait we give on this page, as the candidate of the party for Governor of this State.

MR. GRISWOLD was born in this State in 1822, and educated to the mercantile profession. He has been Mayor of the city of Troy, and a member of Congress for the last three terms. He entered Congress as a Democrat in 1862, being elected in a strongly Republican district by a large majority. He was throughout his term an earnest advocate of the war. He gave a small fortune out of his private purse to equip volunteers and for the support of the families of soldiers. One of the most distinguished of the cavalry regiments of this State was named after him. It was largely through his patriotism and enterprise that the first Monitor was launched and taken to Fortress Monroe in time to oppose and destroy the great rebel ram Merrimac. His vigorous support of Mr. LINCOLN'S administration and its war measures increased his popularity at home, and he was returned to Congress by increased majorities in 1864 and 1866. His majority in 1862 was 1287; in 1864 it was 2923; and in 1866 it amounted to 5316. His home paper, the Troy Times, says of him: "Mr. GRISWOLD is, in the largest sense of the word, a true man. Quick to perceive, and remarkably apt and ready in execution, he possesses administrative abilities of the first order, and is very sure to direct them with prudence as well as vigor. He is a good judge of men as well as of measures, and evinces the strong common-sense which, after all, is the basis of success in statesmanship as well as in human enterprises."

IN THE GARDEN.

THERE she sits! The arching trees
Cast their trellis shade before her,
As it passes by the breeze
Murmurs admiration o'er her.
Odorous with a sweet perfume
All for her the summer bringing Flowers with beauty, youth, and bloom!
All for her the song-birds singing!

Mistress she of all around!
Than the fair scene round her fairer!
Rose, that decks her hair, you're found
Less sweet than your newly wearer!
Lisping, sing, and zephyr, waft
Sweeping down that garden shady,
If throughout the world there be
One more bonny than your lady!

Look, beyond, the gabled wall
Of yon mansion hoar and olden,
Owns her heiress of the hall,
Lighted with the sunshine golden!
Calm, as he nestles by,
Verily seems jealous of her;
Sunbeams, as you past her fly
Keep a constant watch above her!

Very studious I see her bend
Gently o'er a three-kneed letter!
Who each cherished line has penned?
Can it be, in golden fetter
Some one holds that pure, young heart?
Or perchance some girlish friend, or Sister long held far apart,
Is the writer and the sender?

Hark! a step: and, with a bound,
Carlo leaves his place beside her,
Hearing, quick as sight, the sound,
Careful lest some ill betide her!
Soon he sees the step is his:
Whisper, gently, breeze above her,
Whisper "Unexpected 'tis,
'Tis the writer and her lover!"

BY THE MURMURING OF THE SEA.—[SEE POEM, PAGE 478.]

BY THE MURMURING OF THE SEA.

See Illustration on page 477.

WHERE I think of the days of my youth that are gone,
I could break my heart; from my life's stone lea
Has faded the flower of the hours, and done
Is the song I heard by the sea.

I shall spend such a time, as never more
I shall find such a time on earth set free,
And fetter'd again, when I saw the shore
No longer, nor heard the sea.

Or is it the chest of memory brings
Despair, as sweet as a reverie,
For the days that are dead, that were bright as the wings
In the sunlight, over the sea?

I forget the world in that morning dream,
And a dull, long vengeance life wreaks on me;
And thrice as sweet is what sweet did seem
By the murmuring of the sea.

When fragrant round me are memory's flowers,
I walk among men disdainfully,
Golden, indeed, are these traders' hours,
But not like mine by the sea.

The mood came on me to-day, my feet
Fared up the town, but my soul did flee
From the sordid murmuring of the street
To the murmuring of the sea.

And I was wild for the idle days—
I, whose set life is now mere praiseworthy
Than it was when, younger, I watch'd the days
Grow bright, grow dark, of the sea.

For the idle days when I found a love,
And lost her again: and I wonder if she Thinks that she ever had idle above,
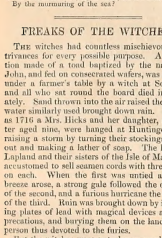
And wings, and was by the sea.

But I—oh, it is because thou art lost
That I pine, my love, so much for thee!—
That my soul has arms to embrace the ghost
Of the days that went by the sea!



Yet who would again live his best time o'er,
That was spent upon blowing hill, maybe,
Or in breathless dale, or, as mine, on the shore
By the murmuring of the sea?

FREAKS OF THE WITCHES.

THE witches had countless mischievous contrivances for every possible purpose. A detection made of a toad baptized by the name of John, and fed on consecrated wafers, was thrown under a farmer's table by a witch at Nouseul, and all who sat round the board died immediately. Soul thrown into the air raised the wind; water similarly used brought down rain. So late as 1716 a Mrs. Hicks and her daughter, the latter aged nine, were hanged at Huntingdon for raising a storm by turning their stockings inside out and making a lather of soap. The hags of Lapland and their sisters of the Isle of Man were accustomed to sell seamen cords with three knots on each. When the first was untied a gentle breeze arose, a strong gale followed the opening of the second, and a furious hurricane the loosing of the third. Rain was brought down by inscribing plates of lead with magical devices and incantations, and burying them on the land of the person thus devoted to the furies.

But the witches were not always employed in distributing ruin and murder. They varied their amusements with a little plunder; and for every act they had a settled formula. When they desired to be furnished with beer or wine, for example, they had merely to ascertain who in their vicinity was provided with these drinkables. This done, the witch stuck a knife into the wall, placed a pail underneath, cut a few capers, and muttered some gibberish. Thereupon whatever liquor was mentioned streamed plentifully from the knife-handle until the vessel was full or the reservoir empty. And they supplied their other wants in similar fashion.

And the necromancers could be sufficiently conservative when it suited their purpose, as was shown by their partiality for carrying the amulet. This might consist of any thing from a dried toad to a precious stone, and assume any form, but was usually preferred in that of a seal. One of these rings was worn by a beauty at a medieval court, and so long as she lived it rendered her the object of the monarch's passionate attachment. Nor did the amulet lose its power when the lady died. Being buried with its owner it drew the royal lover with resistless force to her tomb. A certain bishop, suspecting the cause, secured the ring, and thus transferred the monarch's favor to himself. But it proved an annoyingly obtrusive that, as a matter of personal comfort, the churchman hastened to get rid of it. He therefore had the ring all immersed in out-of-the-way places, and thus caused his master to perpetrate the oddest freaks and exhibit the most grotesque affection. At length a course of penance, undertaken with that object, procured the prelate a dream which revealed the means of reversing the charm. The very simple one it proved, consisting merely of burning the bones of the lady along with the survivors of the witches who had aided her in the formation of the talisman. One species of amulet—the Hand of Glory —was considered useful in house-breaking; and another in securing the silence of the Sabbath against some of the risks attached to their profession. The latter consisted of a piece of parchment inscribed with the names of the three Kings of Cologne, and endowed with the necessary virtue by being rubbed over the skulls of those worthies. So long as it was worn it was esteemed a certain preservative from sudden death.

THE RESCUE STATIONS.

THE Metropolitan Board of Health of this city, in addition to many other wise reforms inaugurated by it, has manufactured a life-saving apparatus, established a number of rescue stations, and published the rules adopted by the Board for the resuscitation of the apparently drowned. In order to give a wider circulation to these important instructions, with which all persons ought to make themselves acquainted, we reproduce the rules as published by the Board, together with three engravings illustrative of the subject.

THE RESCUE STATIONS AND APPARATUS.

At every Rescue Station will be found apparatus mentioned in the list, the rescue apparatus, namely, the life-saving lines, grapnels, pole, and ladders are provided.

Every police officer by the water-side is regarded as having authority over the rescue apparatus, but whoever can reach the apparatus first and employ it, should not take the effort, and the patient's face downward, with one cheek resting on the forehead. Quickly wipe and cleanse the mouth, and if the patient does not breathe, immediately begin the following movements:

First—Let the patient on his back, with shoulders raised and supported easily on a folded coat or some kind of a cushion.

To Keep up a Free Entrance of Air into the Windpipe.—Let a person sit at the patient's head; grasp the tongue gently and firmly with his fingers covered with a bit of handkerchief and drawing it forward over the lips; then another hold it or press the under jaw (chin) up so as to retain the tongue protruding from the mouth; but it is better to hold it in that position with the hand.

To Produce Imitation of the Movements of Breathing.—Raise the patient's extended arms above the head, sides of the head, and then pull them steadily, firmly, and slowly outward and forward. Next turn down the arms by the patient's sides and bring them closely and firmly across the pit of the stomach and press them and the sides and front of the chest gently but strongly for a moment, then quickly begin to repeat the first movement.

Let these same kinds of movements be made very deliberately and without ceasing until the patient breathes well; let the two movements be repeated about twelve or fifteen times in a minute, but not more rapidly, endeavoring to imitate as nearly all the long while air is the object of the first or upward and outward movement, and to expel as much air as you are able is the object of the second or downward motion and pressure. This artificial respiration should be steadily kept up for fifty minutes or more when the patient appears not to breathe; and after the natural breathing begins let the same motion be very gently continued, and let the proper stimulants be given in the interval.

If help and blankets are at hand have the body stripped and wrapped in blankets, but not allow the movements to be interrupted. Do not dress you apply dry clothing. And the assistants should briskly rub the feet and legs, shielding the body and rubbing upward, with the movements of the arms and chest are going on. And apply hartshorn or a feather within the nostrils occasionally, and sprinkle or lightly dash cold water upon the face and neck. The legs and feet may be rubbed and wrapped in hot blankets if blue or cold, or if the weather is cold.

Give brandy by the tea-spoonful, or hot sling two or three times a minute, until the beating of the pulse can be felt at the wrist, but be careful and not give more of the stimulant than is necessary. Warmth should be kept up in the feet and legs, and, as soon as the patient breathes naturally, let him be carefully removed to a house and be placed in bed under medical care.

If there is help enough at hand when the patient is taken from the water or afterward, let the nearest medical officer in the catalogue (or any other physician now by) be called, but let there be no waiting for a physician. Do the best that can be done methodically and deliberately according to the foregoing rules.

LITTLE SORROWS.

MONTAIGNE declares the smallest and slightest annoyances to be the most piercing; and a small print, says he, most tires the eyes, so the little affairs the most disturb us. Mr. Thackeray protests that the chief ills of life are one thing: the loss of your fortune he calls a mere flea-bite; the loss of your wife—how many men have supported it and married comfortably afterward? "It is not what you lose, but what you have left to bear, that is hard." What, he asks in another place, would the possession of a hundred thousand a year, or fame and the applause of the world, avail him, if the favored and best-beloved woman, or any glory, and happiness, or good fortune, avail to a gentleman, for instance, who has not the power to enjoy them only with the condition of wearing a shoe with a couple of nails or sharp pebbles inside it? "All fame and happiness would disappear and plunge down that shoe. All life would rankle round those little nails." Not one of us, it has been asserted, but would compound all his little troubles for some heavy one, and so have it over at once. And although the Marquis of Angleseu grew with the loss of his limb indifference the cutting off of his leg upon that wooden table they still show you at Waterloo, neither uttering a word nor moving a muscle, a shrewd doubt is suggested "whether he would have borne a scalded foot, or the infliction of a tight boot on a bad corn, for his leg, equally well."

A constant succession of little contemptible worries tends, as Dr. Boyd somewhere says, to foster a spiteful, grumbling disposition, such as renders a man a nuisance to himself and to those about him. Real, great misfortunes and trials are frequently as serving to ennoble the character; whereas ever-recurring petty annoyances produce a pettiness and irritability of mind.

"I meet with small troubles we gather up our endurance, and pray for Divine support and guidance; but, as for small blisters—the insect curses as James Montgomery called them!—of daily life, we are very ready to think that they are too little to trouble the Almighty with them, or even to call up our attention to face them."

Again and again we read in the life of the dear Charles Lamb how that impatient in trifles, he was the most calm and enduring of human beings on all great occasions; and it always seemed to the writer as if he resented petty annoyances because they rose from petty causes, but that he bent with humble resignation to great infliction as believing them to come direct from on high. He is supposed to have misled his medical attendants by his buoyancy when most seriously ill; for how were they to know that a man so sensitive and restless upon minor matters could so patiently endure intense suffering? "They did not know that one was the triumph of nerves, the other of heart."

M. de Tocqueville affirms of himself, in one of his letters, that in moments of great excitement, or of important business, he preserved his composure, but was easily disturbed by the daily worries of life.

Hazlitt conjectures that if we could remember distinctly, we should discover that the two things that have most affected us in the course of our lives have been, one of them of the greatest, and the other of the smallest possible consequence.

Theodore Hook asserts the strongest feelings to be excited, the bitterest pangs inflicted, by a sudden change in the ordinary, the most common, the most trifling incidents of our lives.

"To great evils the elastic mind of man expands—it knits itself for imminent dangers—it withstands great shocks; but in the more minute changes intimately connected with its habits and feelings it fails." Certain it is, moralizes Petrarch, that men usually repudiate their wives for great and visible faults; but he traces at the same time a prodigious amount of marriage infelicity to petty traits of temper, and those small but frequent discordances of taste and manner which fret the tenor of daily life.

Some men, says Jeremy Taylor, are more vexed with a fly than with a wound; and when the gusts of wrath are deep, and the reason is disquieted but not perfectly awakened, it is often seen that he is fuller of trouble than if, in the daylight of his reason, he had to contend with a potent enemy.

About a large sorrow, it has been well said, there is an excitement which sensibly mitigates its pain: a man may be perfectly conscious to himself that the notice which he receives after some great bereavement is pleasant; but the flurry and bustle of receiving condolences, and of making new arrangements, do nevertheless dull the edge of his suffering; for the pertinacity with which people talk of all the circumstances of a great sorrow is reasonably alleged as proof that there is some balm in the operation—just as the poor indemnify themselves for an abscess or a broken limb by the pleasure of showing the place to every one who comes to see them. Whereas to the petty miseries of daily life there is no set-off of this kind. "They raise no excitement, they give no importance, they furnish no materials for gossip with a friend. Each of them, at the time it inflicts its minute puncture, brings with it the perplexing suggestion that it is too paltry a matter for a man to annoy himself about; and the vexation is only aggravated by the shame which its sufferer feels in thinking over it."

One of Charles de Bernard's sententious husbands has this touch to tax his wife withal, meaningly perfect as she is to outsiders—that faults she has, though he confesses them to be light ones; but then they exist, and pin-pricks befall one oftener than ponderal stabs.

Women are more especially liable to the restraints and exactions, and pains, and penalties of conventional life; and of these Mr. Herbert Spencer has said, that the sum total would probably exceed that of all others. For, he holds, that could we add up the trouble, the cost, the jealousies, vexations, misunderstandings, the loss of time, and the loss of pleasure which these conventionalities entail, and could readily realize the extent to which we are all daily hampered by them, daily enslaved by them, we should, perhaps, come to the conclusion that the tyranny of Mrs. Grundy is worse than any other tyranny we suffer from.

The Jew of the whole subject is contained in Byron's assertion, that "Our least of sorrows are such as we weep:

But the vile daily drop on deeply wrench
The soul out (like the stone) with petty cares."

It has been well said that in matters of wit forty sixpences are not equal to a shilling, and it is a paradox which we can all understand. And the counter-paradox is not less worthy of acceptance —that, as regards the trouble of life, forty sixpences are far more than a sovereign.

EXTRACT from the "Life of Washington Irving," by his nephew, PIERRE M. IRVING, vol. IV., page 273:

"The doctor prescribed, as an experiment—what had been suggested by Dr. (O. W.) HOLMES on his late visit—JONAS WHITCOMB'S REMEDY FOR ASTHMA,' a teaspoonful in a wineglass of water, to be taken every four hours. A good night was the result."—[Com.]

GREAT AMERICAN

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 30 cents, 35 cents, 50 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED COFFEE, 30c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we like to be liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them as represented, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large store is kept, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one half, because the Express charges by so sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name in any way, wholly or in part, as they are

IMITATIONS AND OUTRIGHT FRAUDS.

We have no branch stores, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

STRENGTHEN THE DEFENCES!

Malaria, the most deadly enemy of health, is every where active in July and August. The blazing Sun is decomposing and fermenting every species of vegetable and animal abomination, and poisonous gases that depress and infect the system are universally present. On the prairies, in the swamps, in the woods, and in the midst of crowded cities, this development of the elements of disease is now going on. In short, the human body is in a state of siege, and reason and common sense suggest that its DEFENCES BE STRENGTHENED. A stimulant, a tonic, a corrective, and an alterative are required to put it in perfect trim, and these four grand requisites are combined in

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

A man must be made of steel not to be effected by the morbid matter set afloat in the atmosphere by the decay of an almost vernal sun. Nine-tenths of the community are premonished at this season by debility, indigestion, headache, want of appetite, indisposition for exertion, nervousness, etc., that they NEED SOMETHING TO BUILD THEM UP AND REGULATE THEIR ANIMAL MACHINERY. Do they want to "fight it out on that line all Summer," or to achieve an immediate victory over their unpleasant symptoms, and secure that rest of Heaven's blessings—"a sound mind in a sound body?" If they do, they have in their desire, let them resort to the BITTERS without delay. That agreeable and potent vegetable regenerative will soon restore the system to HEALTH, vigor—regulating the liver, strengthening the stomach, gently relieving the bowels, and giving vigor, elasticity, and energy to the whole frame. Convalescents and broken fists No man who reads the testimony on which they are founded can for a moment doubt them.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.
THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled in four holes, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing ten times as much. Each watch is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. L. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION: Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our agents. We will state most positively that we employ no agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently their representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

THE DOG POUND.

THE Dog-star is not yet in the ascendant, but the dog law is in full force; the dog-stealers of New York are in their glory and owners are in misery. The dog law of this city goes into force in the middle of June of each year, and from that time forward the dog pound at Seventy-fifth Street and East River is filled to overflowing with stray and unmuzzled dogs, caught up and returned by young urchins anxious for the reward of fifty cents offered for the arrest of all unmuzzled dogs. The pound-keepers are required to retain all dogs arrested for twenty-four hours; if not redeemed in that time they are thrown into a huge cistern near by and drowned. At all hours of the day all manner of persons are to be seen at the pound in search after all manner of curs; and many humorous and occasionally pathetic scenes take place. One of the latter is illustrated on our first page a scene which partakes of both natures. It is that of an urchin who has just recovered his long-lost dog, and is clasping the hands of the pound-keeper, and it is difficult to say which is the most rejoiced, the preserved or the preserver.

THE DEMOCRATIC POLICY OF ANARCHY

IT is said the Democratic party proposed that if the Government of the United States should surrender to the rebellion. The consequences of such a course are inconceivable. Its mere proposition was monstrous, and was spurned by the patriotism and the patriotism of the country. Failing to secure the success of the rebellion at that time the Democratic party, with the same inhuman hostility to the principles of the Government, now proposes, by force of arms, to subject the Southern States to an impotent rebels, and to abandon the debt incurred in overthrowing the open rebellion. Of course, as it called itself the only Constitutional party when it encouraged and palliated secession, so it calls itself the only conservative party now that it proposes to undo the whole work of reconstruction, and to cheat the public creditors.

Every body ought to understand precisely what this election means. It is to decide whether the rebels or the loyal country won the victory. It is to decide whether GENERAL GRANT or WADE HAMPTON represents the national conviction and purpose. A party intention is to be judged by the character as well as by the words of those who control it. There were certain Democrats in 1864 who denied that the Democratic party was opposed to the war. But the Democrats who denied of the party was controlled by the peace Copperheads who made its platform, and cared little, after having the party declaration of faith, what kind of candidate was placed upon it. There are Democrats now who deny that the Democratic party is revolutionary, anarchical, and dishonorable. But the positive declaration of the party, the peace Copperheads who demanded surrender in 1864, now demand the next best thing, which is repudiation of the war debt, and forcible resistance to reconstruction. They have made the New York platform of repudiation, have placed upon it the instigator of the New York riots of 1863, and with that as a key to announce his desire to see a President elected who would "disperse" the State Governments in the Southern States.

This makes evident what every body who reflects understands, that all the disaffected, disorganizing, reckless, destructive classes of the population are banded together in an association that calls itself the Democratic party. Its negative part is the Eastern faction, men of no real convictions of any kind, inspired only by the hope of power, and wielded to nominate MR. CHASE. Its positive part is the combination of peace Copperheads and active rebels, of VALLANDIGHAM and WADE HAMPTON, hostility revenge at any price. The plan of these last, who are the numerous part, is to terrify the colored vote from the polls as much as possible in the Southern States, crowd in the rebel white vote in every State whether restored or not, and insist that it shall be counted, appealing to arms if it is not. This plan is announced by WADE HAMPTON, who does not even pretend to have relinquished his confidence in the final success of the rebellion, and WADE HAMPTON'S view is defended in the New York World, which has already declared that the question to be settled by the election is whether the reconstruction policy is to stand. WADE HAMPTON'S words are:

> "We can have no relief unless this great Democratic party will come out and pledge itself that we shall have a fair election—that the white people of the South shall vote: and I want you all to register an oath that when they do vote those votes shall be counted, and if there is a majority of white votes that you will place SEYMOUR and BLAIR to the White House in spite of all the bayonets that shall be brought against them. I only want to see the election fair; and if they do that, even with the incubus of black rule, we can carry the Southern States."

WADE HAMPTON is ready for any additional war that he thinks might be waged upon Northern soil. The World calls him the successor of CALHOUN in the affections of South Carolina. But unless the country repents that it did not follow CALHOUN, it may wisely institute in following such a successor.

The Democratic campaign in this election is merely the attempt of the old rebel element—the doctrine and spirit of CALHOUN and TOOMBS and JEFFERSON DAVIS—to return to power. Its leaders hope that the country is so weary, so heavily burdened, so disspirited, that it will submit to any change. In this they reason as New York in 1868 as they reasoned at Chicago in 1864. When they were sure that the long and tremendous struggle, the hope of victory so long postponed, the slow and doubtful advance of SHERMAN, the delayed triumph of GRANT, the fatigue, the poverty, the sickness, the want of foreign sympathy, had all plunged the country into such a gulf of disappointment and despair that it would willingly yield to a vigorous summons of surrender. They were profoundly mistaken. But the spirit and method of the party were fully revealed. It counts for success not upon the national approval of its principles and sympathy with its aims, not upon the conscience and intelligence and generous humanity of the country, not upon the inspiring love of liberty and regard for the peaceful sanctities of law, but upon fatigue and disappointment and prejudice, and the wish of revenge, and also upon fear, and the hatred of race, upon all that is meanest in human nature and vilest in motives of action. Therefore it declares that the great result of the war is to be undone, and the public creditor swindled; that if the freedman can not be again actually enslaved he shall be deprived of every appearance of liberty; that loyal and late rebel States shall be derided, and those that glory in disaffection exalted. Therefore it nominates a man who declared that he would see the Union perish rather than slavery and that successful coercion would be a revolutionary as secession. It names as his constitutional successor one who assumed the right of "trample into dust" the laws made by the representatives of the people; and relies for support upon frank rebels who would have the Executive installed by bayonets.

The Democratic leaders were mistaken in 1864. If they do not as utterly misconceive in 1868 the patriotism and intelligence and purpose, those people will deserve the Mexican doom in which WADE HAMPTON and the party which he and his companions control would gladly involve them.

EQUAL TAXATION.

THE Democratic platform declares for "equal taxation of every species of property according to its real value, including Government bonds and other securities." This is the only form in which it means that the bond-holders are a privileged class, and that their bonds ought to be taxed according to their real value. That has been settled by the highest court.

The act of Congress authorizing the issue of Treasury notes in 1862 expressly provided that "all stocks, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and the interest thereon, corporations or associations within the United States, shall be exempt from taxation by or under State authority." This had already been decided by the Supreme Court to be the law; and for a very obvious reason. If the States could tax United States securities they could tax them to destruction, and thus the National Government be paralyzed. Of course, a law which secures untrammeled power to the National Government is not to be repealed by the Democratic spirit which framed the New York platform. In Maryland, in Pennsylvania, in South Carolina, and in New York the attempt has been made to tax the national securities by the States, and in every case the Supreme Court has decided that it can not be done, because such a decision might be fatal to the existence of the United States. The persons who took the bonds of the United States took them with the condition distinctly affirmed by Congress that they should not be taxed, and the Democratic platform demands, notwithstanding the authority of Congress and of the Supreme Court, that they shall be taxed. There could not be a more direct and palpable swindle. It is naked theft. It is the repudiation which it has been determined shall use false weights and measures. It is proclaiming wholesale robbery as the national policy.

"But isn't it very hard," says an honest reader, "that my neighbor JONES should have to pay such an enormous tax because his property is of one kind, and my neighbor SMITH, a great deal richer man, pays infinitely less, because his property is of another kind?" Yes —that seems hard. But look at it fairly. There are but two authorities that can tax us, the State and the United States. Now when the United States was in extremity SMITH turned his property into money and lent it to the Government, which said to him, "If I go, your money goes with me; if I escape, the bond I give you shall not be taxed." The Government escaped. Now the Democratic party body clse to tax the bond, it permits somebody else to break its word to SMITH, who helped it in extremity. It ought not to permit that. No honest man, not JONES himself if he be honest, will insist that it should. But this is what the Democratic Platform demands should be done. It demands that the States shall tax bonds which were taken under the guarantee of the United States that they should not be taxed. It demands that the Government shall permit the most shameless swindle.

"Why, then," asks our honest reader, "why should not Congress itself tax them?" In the first place, it is plain that if it should do this it would break its own promise to the takers of the bonds, because the amount of the tax would be just so much reduction of the interest upon them. It would be the same as declaring that henceforth the Government would pay six per cent. interest upon bonds for which it had promised to pay seven. The transactions between individuals every man knows what this would be, and what the consequences. A merchant who should do it would be ruined forever as the most dishonest of men. In the second place, the Constitution forbids the Government to lay a tax upon persons or property except by apportioning it among the States according to population. This is impracticable, and the National Government, therefore, taxes indirectly. It taxes consumers and incomes, and when interest must bear its share of the general burden, the income derived from the Government bonds is equally taxed. Thus if Congress should tax the bonds it would be both a dishonest and unconstitutional act.

But the Democratic platform does not ask or mean that Congress shall do it. When it demands equality of taxes upon every species of property according to its real value, it uses an expression which is applicable only to State authorities. The framers of the platform well know, and this they intended. It is part of the policy of hostility between the States and the National Government. It is intended to place the States in the sight of an oppressor, and the former in that of defenders of the people. It is the old devil of state sovereignty. It is the spirit of secession which has cost us already a bloody war. This clause of the Democratic platform demands that the States shall bring the Union into disgrace. Does any honest reader believe that to be for his interest?

COUNTING THE VOTES.

THE bill in regard to the electoral college, in the amended form in which it passed, provides that no votes shall be received or counted from the States lately in rebellion, except from those which before the 4th of March, 1867, shall have adopted a Constitution under which a State government shall have been organized, under which representation shall have been apportioned, and provided that the State shall have become entitled to representation in Congress under the reconstruction acts. It would seem that this bill was passed except for the claims now made by the Democratic party. But as an explicit statement of the intentions of Congress, and of the principle upon which the lately rebel States are again to take part in a national election, it may be very useful. The bill excludes only such States as shall not have complied with the reconstruction conditions expressly stated and intelligible. It says very distinctly that States which have not recovered their representation in Congress, and which have not accepted their position in the Union, shall not participate in the election.

The President, and the party which holds with him, have said that the rebellion was overpowered, every insurgent State at once resumed all its rights, with an increased basis of representation owing to emancipation, naturally elected rebels to Congress. They, with WADE HAMPTON, that "the white people of the South shall vote," and that their vote, not that of the votes counted by Congress, nor the vote alone of the States that have been restored, but the white vote exclusively—of Texas and Mississippi as well as of Arkansas and Georgia —shall be received, and is the point of the keyport if Congress refuses. It is well, therefore, under these circumstances to understand in advance just where we are, and what we mean. It is well for Congress to say by a large beforehand that the electoral vote will be taken in the lately disturbed States as in the loyal States, under the auspices of the National government which has been recognized by Congress. This is, of course, the only way; but let it be announced as the only way. Let it be also announced that no white vote, not black vote, nor vote of any kind, will be received from a lately rebellious State not yet restored by authority of Congress.

The New York World, in discussing this question, asks whether, in case the result of the election depended upon the vote of Florida, and that vote were Democratic, and were thrown out by Congress, the Democratic party, with the physical force upon its side, would submit or ought to submit? The reply to this question is, that if the vote in Florida were taken under the authority of the existing Government in that State, Congress declares in advance that it will not by party character, it will be counted, and that if it is taken without the authority of the State Government, then, whatever its party character, it will be rejected. Does the World mean to say that a vote taken any how in Florida should be received and counted as valid? Does it think that three electoral votes in Massachusetts, taken under the authority of the State Government, should be either nullified or doubled by three votes in Florida, irresponsibly polled? If it does, the country will probably differ with it. If it does not, its question has no meaning.

Or suppose that the so-called Governor HUMPHREYS, in Mississipi, orders an election of white voters only, or of colored voters only, or of both, and transmits the result to Congress. What is to be received and counted? Congress will have only to ask who is Governor HUMPHREYS of Mississipi, point to the terms of the present bill, declare that Mississipi has not complied to the conditions, and exclude the vote whether it be for GRANT or for SEYMOUR. But suppose the vote, if admitted, would elect GRANT? Does the World think that in that case "the Democratic party would resist [the rejection], and make its resistance effectual?" If it does not, it confesses that its Democratic resistance is not to secure a political right but a party advantage. Before the Convention met the World said that the Southern Democrats were forced in honor to accept the situation for the time, and vote under the existing governments. To General BLAIR'S talk of force, and to WADE HAMPTON'S subsequent programme, it said: "There is no way out of this dilemma except by the sword, and the land has been already drenched by too much fraternal blood." But since BLAIR is nominated and WADE HAMPTON approves, the World says: "If the election shall show that the Democratic party are a majority and Congress shall declare the Republican state governments elected, our duty to resist will be unquestionable." Suppose the election does not show it without counting Mississipi? Is the right of resistance still unquestionable?

All these things show how very desirable it is that the majority for GRANT should be as overwhelming as that for LINCOLN in 1864. That will settle these questions. That will declare in a tone that MR. WADE HAMPTON and MR. ROBERT TOOMBS and MR. HOWELL COBB and MR. ALEXANDER STEPHENS, and all rebels, repudiators, and Copperheads can understand, that the restoration of the Union decreed by its loyal citizens is a restoration that shall stand.

THE HOPE OF "THE LOST CAUSE."

ROBERT TOOMBS, one of the most fiery of secessionists, chafing with baffled hate of Union, denounces "Radicalism" as "the greatest criminal the world ever saw;" and declares that the "arm of the people should fly to the arms of Northern allies to assist in crushing the viper out of existence." In 1864 the viper that TOOMBS and his fellow-Democrats wished to crush was the existence was the Union army. He is a mighty defender of the Constitution, is TOOMBS. Also he is a shining Conservative. His constitutional and conservative Democratic unison we should have if only TOOMBS were back in the Senate and HOWELL COBB in the Treasury Department!

For HOWELL COBB also has been "searing" General GRANT and the Republican platform "with the fires of his indignation." If we remember correctly, although a General during the war, Mr. HOWELL COBB did not take occasion to sear General GRANT with any other kind of fire. MR. COBB—one of the original rebel conspirators in the Cabinet of BUCHANAN, who did what he could to ruin the credit of the country, then ran to try to destroy it—is now of opinion that "the election of General GRANT upon such a set of principles would be the greatest calamity that could possibly befall the whole country." But the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR upon a platform of repudiation of the debt and of trampling reconstruction "into the dust," would be the most constitutional and conservative of boons.

Mr. EDMUND FOOTE, also—familiarly known as Hangman FOOTE, from having told Senator HALE that he would be hung if he came to FOOTE'S State—has been "painfully conscious how that" MR. SEYMOUR "did not entirely concur with MR. PENDLETON and his political friends upon the great financial question now pending." If Democratic unison is to be attained, brought forward "by MR. PENDLETON'S friends, and urged to keep the field as a candidate by the noble-minded and much-undervalued VALLANDIGHAM, "why, MR. HENRY S. FOOTE regards the nomination as "one of the most fortunate results which could possibly have occurred!"

The Richmond Examiner thinks that the letter of General BLAIR has "the ring of the true metal, and is the most fearless exposition of Democratic and Conservative principles which we have yet seen."

The Petersburg Express thinks that BLAIR'S views "are perhaps more satisfactory to the South, and more consistent with the views that have always obtained among our most judicious statesmen, than those which the crisis has called forth from any other leading mind in the country. He is a bold, fearless soldier—one who dares assert the truth, and not over punctil- ions as to the means which he adopts to secure its vindication."

This is the old story. When the Democrats during the war nominated M'Clellan and Pendleton the rebel leaders were painfully anxious for a Democratic success. They knew it would serve their cause. Those leaders are now equally anxious for the election of Seymour and Blair. It is for the same reason. They know it will serve their purpose. It does any body believe that the purposes of Toombs, of Cobb, of Semmes, of Wade Hampton, of the rebel newspapers, are those of patriotic men? "I believe," said Wade Hampton at General Lee's college on his way to the Democratic Convention at New York—"I believe that the election which Stonewall Jackson fell will yet triumph." He hopes and works for a Democratic success, and all the conspicuous, unchanged rebels work and hope for the same result, because they know that nothing but the election of Seymour and Blair can revive the lost cause," and give it the triumph in which they yet believe.

GERMAN TREATIES.

Mr. Bancroft has certainly been a very active Minister. The difficult questions between the United States and the German governments has always been that of the rights of naturalized citizens, and with commendable zeal Mr. Bancroft has devoted himself to its settlement. The point of difference is very plain, and the settlement to be satisfactory must be explicit. The German government claims military service of all born subjects, and deny that emigration evades the obligation. In a treaty upon the subject, therefore, the important question is whether the governments consider that naturalization elsewhere vacates the claim. If this point is left to inference it must be assumed that the government do not concede it. If it is not verbally expressed in the treaty, but depends upon the contemporaneous interpretation of those who make the treaty, the suspicion is against it, and those concerned can not safely trust themselves to the treaty.

The treaty with the North German Band, of which we have formerly spoken, is, in the opinion of many, doubtful upon the important point. Count Bismarck and other weighty authorities said, indeed, that there was no doubt. But if there had been the question, they would not have spoken of doubts. If the treaty had provided that a Prussian, naturalized in the United States, could under no circumstances, and upon no pretense, enter the military service of Prussia, Count Bismarck would hardly have felt it necessary to say that there was no doubt of the meaning of the words. The instinctive criticism upon the explanation of the treaty is, if the treaty means so why does it not say so? There is no question of the understanding placed upon the treaty by those who made and approved it, but it is so worded that it does not satisfy those who are most interested in it.

The treaty with Bavaria just concluded is open to the same objection. The vital question is, whether a Bavarian subject unaccused of crime, who emigrates from Bavaria and is naturalized in the United States, shall be at any liable to military service in Bavaria upon his temporary return to that country? Does Bavaria say aye or no? In the first article she apparently says; for it provides that Bavarian subjects who have become naturalized citizens of the United States, and have lived there continuously for five years, shall be treated in Bavaria as citizens of the United States. But in the second article clouds descend and darkness covers the treaty, for it provides that any naturalized citizen of either country in the latter dicted and punished upon his return to the other if he has committed any act threatened with punishment before his emigration, providing the crime has not become obsolete according to the laws of his original country. This is not plain. Evasion of military duty by emigration is a crime. Desertion is an act threatened with punishment, and it is not a crime which has become obsolete by Bavarian law. Moreover, the third article provides especially for political criminals, so that the second evidently alludes to a particular class of offenders. Is one of those offenders protected by the second article? That ought to be assumed, except for the second, which is clearly a qualification and limitation of the first. In any case the interested Bavarian emigrant can not be sure that he is safe.

Yet these treaties are signs of progress. It is surely something that Prussia and Bavaria agree that Germans naturalized in this country should be treated as citizens of the United States: although it is a foolish supplement that naturalization shall cease to be valid if the citizen lives for more than two years in the territory of the other state. Why shall not citizens of the United States live in Germany or Italy for more than two years without losing their rights of nationality? When a man has chosen his country, with the consent of all the governments concerned, why, upon the same principle, may he not choose to be a citizen of that country at his pleasure? This is a question which we trust a future treaty will soon answer.

THE FALL TRADE AS AFFECTED BY POLITICS.

The taking of stock—a custom now usual with all accurate merchants on and immediately after the 1st of July—is now generally concluded, and it seems to be conceded on all hands, from the survey which ordinarily accompanies it of the spring trade, which then terminates, that the season has been more advantageous than the one which closed on the 1st of January. Moderate profits have been realized, the losses have been largely cut off, and the season has been entered upon without some of the embarrassments which attended the opening of the last.

The fact that the crop of 1867, though large of itself, was in effect diminished by the nearer consumption in the United States than was generally supposed of the crop of 1866, constituted the principal cause of the loss in trade that were made conspicuous by the returns of income to and including the 31st of December, 1867. The drouth that extensively prevailed last year, affecting as it did the pastures of an extensive region in the Middle and some of the Eastern States, also contributed largely to a premature sale on the part of the farmers to supply the food to cattle which the parched fields could not afford. The quantity for export was largely diminished by these two causes, but the influence of which was particularly in the latter part of 1867, and still continues, but with less damaging effect, inasmuch as the action of the drouth was comparatively of that year was light compared with what was held during the season which then terminated, and the difficulty has been bridged over partially by the ready acceptance of substitutes for the markets of Europe, by which the excess of our imports over our exports has been for the time covered.

The practice of carrying over part of one crop until the new one is thoroughly matured and hardened is practiced extensively in the United States, and that to this year there has been no occasion to depart from it, such as was produced by the famine which prevailed in the South up to the summer of 1867, and by the earth refused to yield with the accustomed liberations of Alabama, where a serious want of rain is complained of, the weather has proved favorable, and we may therefore count upon the usual yield which the country has been used to, the hoarding grain sufficient to place the country beyond the contingency of suffering from any absolute loss of the crop of the current season in all parts of the Union. This constitutes the greater advantage over that of last season with which we enter upon the new and successful harvest of this summer. We shall unquestionably, for this reason, have a larger amount for export, unless some unexpected disaster occur. The movement in England and France evinces a demand for many of our agricultural products.

This matter being thus favorable, the question will be examined in all circles what else there is to affect the prospects of an active fall season.

In 1867 we entered upon the fall trade with the apparent disadvantage which resulted from the Act Concerning the English Currency, enacted under the authority of an Act of Congress which has since been repealed, and there existed a wide-spread belief that Congress would take measures for improving the currency. These influences, and the actual weakness communicated to the farming interest by the state of the crop, produced a tendency to low goods, the prices of which had been adjusted in an inflated currency. As contraction is not now possible, and prices have been adjusted to the present basis, and the currency and apprehension of decline, from like causes, can be predicated or supposed.

In the autumn of a Presidential election it is universally known that customers, instead of appearing here in person to make their purchases, send on orders much diminished below their usual average quantities, and the operations of the market were displayed to their observation. They consequently live from hand to mouth, for which contingency preparation has been made by a reduced production. The question whether it is sufficiently reduced will probably be decided in the negative.

The fatherly care which the action of the precious metals the shock of a Presidential election would scarcely be felt, however violent might be the passions which it aroused; but with a paper currency pushed to the utmost verge of prudence, there would be extreme danger if there were a chance of turning over the command of affairs to those who would break down our financial system by a policy announced as to the Five-Twenties, which supposes that advantage to the country will be derived from their payment in greenbacks. It is necessarily based on the assumption that these notes will not be improved to the level of specie, but on the contrary will continue depreciated. It is aimed at the credit of the country, which, by an inflexible law, depends on the pertinacity with which our legislation is directed toward a specie standard of value for the debt payable in specie, distributed over an area of country, many of the States of which are larger than Great Britain and Ireland combined, would fall upon a population now the superior in numbers of the population of that kingdom, and destined to surpass it to such an extent as to load us with the stigma of cowardice as well as of dishonor, if her example of the manful shouldering of a larger debt than ours—hers amounts to seven hundred and ninety-seven millions of pounds sterling, of say $4 65 per pound, while ours is about twenty-five hundred millions of dollars—can be discarded, and the mean and damaging spirit of repudiation be adopted. We are now at the point where the roads fork, and Grant can proudly say, looking at the just platform on which he stands, "Follow my plume, for it leads to honor!" The future of stability depends on his success, which seems assured by the logic which has ever attended events from the very inception of the great conflict. The country is to be scourged beyond any thing which has yet befallen it if the path of expressed opinion is to be reversed in this election.

Assuming that General Grant will be elected, and that the fall business will be shaped upon this expectation, we see no reason to doubt that the trade, though light, will be remunerative, although the course of the election, and particularly in the South, where violence is threatened, will be watched with interest. The guarantee contained in the Constitution to protect each State against domestic violence and of which the latter is particularly in by a State executive, and that also of an adjournment of Congress, need to be met by the action of Congress at the present, which might not be effectual. The States which have been recently admitted to full activity under the Reconstruction Acts have passed out of the guardianship of Congress, so that measures for such protection can not be instituted by the General Government excepting to provide to advance the power by which to exercise or act in case a demand be made by the local authorities, which demand is now a necessary preliminary to action from Washington.

The turn which is in the gold market is due to speculation founded on the apprehension of political excitement, aided by the fact that nearly seventy millions have been exported since the first of January, and that the appropriation likely to be made of seven millions to pay for Alaska, will reduce the amount in the Treasury to under forty millions, which is supposed to be too small to enable the Treasury Department to frustrate the efforts of those speculators who appear to have combined for a rise.

Partially as this tendency that this tendency may be increased by the return of bonds, but they appear to be held abroad with great firmness. Especially on the Continent, where more confidence is shown than on the part of English holders, which latter are influenced to some extent by the adverse tone of the British press, which never fails to present such evidence of imprudence as Mr. Stevens exhibited in the House of Representatives in the debate last week on the Alaska Act; but sensible holders of the debt will doubtless attribute the tone of his speech to the aspects of the campaign as they appear in particular localities, rather than to the general aspect of the people, which will find expression in the election of General Grant, who may be relied upon for upholding the public credit with the firmness shown by him in conducting war with the means which that credit enabled us to raise. His election, therefore, as it will insure stability, is the highest duty now imposed upon our people.

LIGHT WANTED.

Let us have all the light possible upon the subject of the imprisonment of Mary Ann Smith. She is a girl of sixteen or seventeen years of age, who has lived as a domestic in the city of Jersey, in New Jersey. She has no mother, and her father has educated her in the Roman Catholic faith. But she has become a Methodist, and against her will has been confined in a house in this city in a Roman Catholic house of refuge for fallen women, called the House of the Good Shepherd. She was brought before Judge Barnard upon a writ of habeas corpus, but the father appeared with witnesses to ruin his daughter's character, and the Judge was not satisfied that the girl was not a proper subject for the House. She was therefore given back to the custody of the House of the Good Shepherd, in which other punishments is inflicted than confinement.

This seems to be a case in which the moving cause of imprisonment is a change of religious faith. If, indeed, the girl is dissolute, and the father has her correction under the auspices of the church which he prefers, and she consents, nobody will object. But a prostitute desiring to reform may choose her place of detention, whether Protestant or Roman. But if a girl is being punished for preferring the Methodist to the Roman faith it is a matter of the profoundest public concern. It is a most shameless outrage, and the fact that an unsuccessful effort has been made to remedy it will but aggravate the girl's suffering. The Roman Church here as elsewhere will get all it can. Its steady effort to secure a separate share of the school money; the proposal in the last Legislature to appropriate money for the support of the sectarian schools of that Church; the municipal partiality for it at the City Hall, all show a disposition to foster it, of which the Church is fully conscious, and which it will not fail to improve to the utmost. It is most unfortunate that the law does not furnish an opportunity for an immediate and conclusive investigation of this case. If the girl is illegally detained she must, so far as appears, continue to be the victim of injustice until the General Term of the Supreme Court in November. Should the judgment of that court be unfavorable the case will be carried up to the Court of Appeals.

TREASURES FOR THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

It is announced that President White has engaged Goldwin Smith as Professor of English Constitutional History, and James Law of Belfast, a very accomplished and well-known scientific scholar, as Professor in the Agricultural department of Cornell University. But the engagement of these distinguished gentlemen is but an illustration of the work done for the University by its indefatigable President during his absence of three months in Europe. Within that time he has sent from France, Germany, and England the largest and finest collection of books, models, and apparatus ever sent within the same term from the Old World to the New. He has spent for these purposes, in the most careful manner and under the best advice, not less than forty thousand dollars.

Among the treasures he has collected are all of Arnold's models in mechanics, comparative anatomy and botany, from Paris, Brendel's models in botany from Breslau; Schnoder's models of machines from Darmstadt; Duboscq's electric optical apparatus, and Koenig's acoustic apparatus from Paris, including the pieces necessary for Tyndall's and others' most recent experiments. Also Bessel's choicest pieces from Heidelberg; chemical apparatus from Darmstadt, Erfurt, and Berlin; a collection of one hundred and eighty-seven models of glows from the Royal Agricultural College at Hohenheim, which was exhibited at the Great Exposition in Paris, and of which the Prussian Government has ordered a duplicate; instruments of many kinds from London; and besides the Bopp Library of Philology, the acquisition of which has been already announced, a good collection of full sets of the best French, English, and German periodicals.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The Bill discontinuing the Freedmen's Bureau in January, 1869, passed both Houses on July 14.

William M. Evarts was confirmed Attorney-General on July 15.

Final action on the Alaska Appropriation Bill was taken on July 17, and the money was granted by a decided vote.

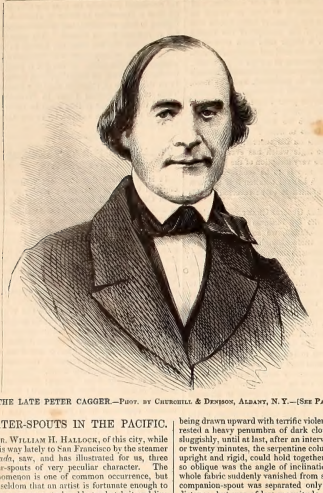
By the law just passed, providing for the preference for Federal offices to heirs of deceased unmarried soldiers or sailors, the mother first, the father second, and the orphan brothers and sisters lastly, are to be entitled to the pay.

The Electoral College Bill, providing that the votes of those tardy or refractory States which have not recontructed, during the present July may not be counted by Congress at the time of the next election for President and Vice-President, shall not be counted, was passed over the President's veto on July 20, and is now a law. The votes of Texas, Georgia, Virginia, and Mississippi are now liable to be thrown out if they do not get in before Congress adjourns.

NEWS ITEMS.

Governor Smith, of Alabama, was inaugurated July 14. His address declares his intention to put a stop to all of political disabilities, and bitterly denounces disenfranchisement except for crimes. He also pardons thirty colored members of the Legislature, and the Canadian and sergeant-at-arms of the House are colored.

A serious affray occurred in Milton, Florida, on the 20th July, and continued the next day. It is said to have been started by the deputy sheriff, who, a former member of the Loyal League, who was supposed to have been killed in the affray, but who subsequently made his appearance. Between fifty and sixty lives are supposed to have been lost.



Advices from the Plains state that the Indians have been very troublesome lately, but were subsequently pacified unless arms and ammunition were supplied to them in accordance with the terms of the treaty. Several depredations were committed soon afterward, and the Intelligent Agency in the Department was ordered to prepare for active service.

Governor Orr vetoed, on July 15, several ill-proclamations announcing that the Constitutional amendment known as the Fourteenth had been fully ratified by the necessary number of States, and has now become a part of the Constitution. It confers equal civil and civil rights in all the States and Territories of citizens and race and color, and declares that persons born or naturalized in the United States citizens thereof. It abates also the system of representation in Congress on the basis of suffrage, leaving every State free to exclude the universal suffrage of male citizens of males above the age of twenty-one years, thus excluding the women under the supreme law.

FOREIGN NEWS

Tare celebrate the 4th of July in Panama in a singular way. The election for President was renewed on the 4th of July of the last date it was gone for Dr. Amador and against the Government whereupon revolutionists broke out, and the next morning, by which the acting President was arrested; General Tejada, Secretary of the State troops, was inaugurated Provisional President; and a force was sent to arrest Amador, who will probably be banished. A decree was then issued declaring the Isthmus in a state of war, suspending constitutional guarantees, and stopping the transit of the Rio Grande.

Lord Lisgar, Governor-General, whose visited England to obtain a release of their province from the Canadian Confederation, returned to Halifax on the 18th July, and were warmly welcomed by the populace. A deputation was also gone over to solicit the Canadian Ministers to also returned with them, and was received with kisses and a demonstration toward throwing him overboard.

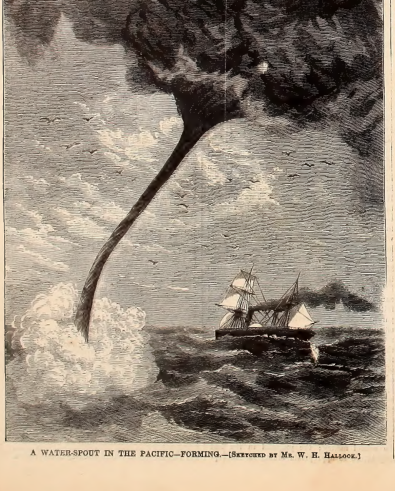
WATER-SPOUTS IN THE PACIFIC.



MR. WILLIAM H. HALLOCK, of this city, while on his way lately to San Francisco by the steamer Nevada, saw, and has illustrated for us, three water-spouts of very peculiar character. The phenomenon is one of common occurrence, but it is seldom that an artist is fortunate enough to be so near one as to be able to sketch it and live to tell the tale.

Those seen by MR. HALLOCK were in latitude 13° 30′ N., longitude 91° 52′ W., immediately off the southwestern coast of Guatemala. The sun was partially obscured by showery clouds, when two water-spouts were seen some two and a half miles due west from the ship. They seemed to slowly approach the vessel, the water beneath them being in great commotion. A heavy, dark shadow rested over the surface of the water, except in the comparatively small space at the terminus of the spout, which, for convenience, might be called a huge sea-serpent suspended between earth and heaven. At this point of contact, at the base of the column, the spectacle was suggestive of a seething caldron, or a section of the "cave of the winds" at Niagara, clouds of vapor being drawn upward with terrific violence. Above rested a heavy penumbra of dark cloud, moving sluggishly, until at last, after an interval of fifteen or twenty minutes, the serpentine column, at first upright and rigid, could hold together no longer, so oblique was the angle of inclination, and the whole fabric suddenly vanished from sight. The companion-spout was separated only by a short distance, but was of less magnitude, and disappeared almost simultaneously, after performing evolutions corresponding with those already described; and where lately the sea foamed with rage calm now succeeded, with nothing to mark the spot except swarms of gulls, attracted, it may be, by carcasses of dead fish.

Subsequently another water-spout was detected in the act of forming. MR. HALLOCK observed a small pear-shaped cloud forming overhead, of a whitish ashen color, and, watching carefully through a glass, noticed presently that the stem began slowly to drop or elongate. At the time there was no perceptible disturbance of the water beneath, but within five minutes light feathers of spray began to fly from the crest of the waves, which might easily have been mistaken for the splash of a porpoise or the blow of a whale, and almost immediately upward and descending funnels of white vapor, the latter very dark, met in mid-air, forming a close connection, the shape being serpentine. Rapidly this column began to revolve, and acquired a steadily progressive motion; the sea at its base was changed to a bed of foam and vapor, rounded into a fleecy cushion for the support of the lofty superstructure. Fears were entertained that this spout, which was at one time within a few yards of the ship, would burst and deluge it; the passengers were ordered below and the hatches closed; and the big gun was got in readiness to attack the strange visitor, should it approach too near, hoping to break the suspended column of water while yet at a distance, and thereby avert the threatened deluge. But the dreaded spout finally passed astern and began to dissolve. The column which at first stood nearly perpendicular, dark, rigid, and heavy against the clouds (the upper terminus gently blending with the body of vapor behind it, the lower veiled by fleecy wreaths of mist), was now attenuated to a mere film—a spiral tube of most delicate texture, within which was observable a tremulous motion, as though the lifting power was being relaxed, and it was uncertain whether the dark body of water within should finally yield to the power of gravitation or ascend heavenward. For a moment the light spiral net-work of the tube was darkened by the downward rush of waters. Then followed a partial return, when lo! the structure separated in mid-heaven and an immense body of water literally slid down the funnel with a heavy thud, as falling lead, into the bosom of the deep. In other words, the upward motion of the inclosing cylinder of white vapor was reversed, and then followed a headlong rush to the sea, down the inclined plane. But this was not all. The falling column assumed the appearance of a coil in a rope (a lariat, for example); the film that was drawn upward was also coiled. After receding a space, the lower section seemed instinct with life, and re-erected itself heavenward. The union thus formed was but momentary, for when a clap of thunder was heard the parts were disengaged, one falling into the sea, and the other floating away with the clouds—as the tail of a kite follows the wind if broken from its fastenings. In the descent a dark, spherical body was observed, having nearly the apparent diameter of the moon at its full, which was plausibly explained to be nothing more than an end or sectional view of the funnel or stem of the water-spout.

FIFTH NARRATIVE.

The Story resumed by Franklin Blake.

CHAPTER I.

BUT few words are needed, on my part, to complete the narrative that has been presented in the Journal of Ezra Jennings.

Of myself, I have only to say that I awoke on the morning of the twenty-sixth, perfectly ignorant of all that I had said and done under the influence of the opium—from the time when the drug first did its work on me, to the time when I opened my eyes on the sofa in Rachel's sitting-room.

Of what happened after my waking, I do not feel called upon to render an account in detail. Confining myself merely to results, I have to report that Rachel and I thoroughly understood each other before a single word of explanation had passed on either side. I decline to account, and Rachel declines to account, for the extraordinary rapidity of our reconciliation. Sir and Madam, look back to the time when you met, passionately attached to each other—and you will know what happened, after Ezra Jennings had shut the door of the sitting-room, as well as I know it myself.

I have, however, no objection to add, that we should have been certainly discovered by Mrs. Merridew but for Rachel's presence of mind. She heard the sound of the old lady's dress in the corridor, and instantly ran out to meet her. I heard Mrs. Merridew say, "What is the matter?" and I heard Rachel answer, "The explosion!" Mrs. Merridew instantly permitted herself to be taken by the arm and led into the garden, out of the way of the impending shock. On her return to the house she met me in the hall, and expressed herself as greatly struck by the vast improvement in Science since the time when she was a girl at school. "Explosions, Mr. Blake, are infinitely milder than they were. I assure you, I barely heard Mr. Jennings's explosion from the garden. And no smell afterward, that I can detect, now we have come back to the house! I must really apologize to your medical friend. It is only due to him to say that he has managed it beautifully!"

So, after vanquishing Betteredge and Mr. Bruff, Ezra Jennings vanquished Mrs. Merridew herself. There is a great deal of undeveloped liberal feeling in the world, after all!

At breakfast Mr. Bruff made no secret of his reasons for wishing that I should accompany him to London by the morning train. The watch kept at the bank, and the result which might yet come of it, appealed so irresistibly to Rachel's curiosity (that she at once decided (if Mrs. Merridew had no objection) on accompanying us back to town—so as to be within reach of the earliest news of our proceedings.

Mrs. Merridew proved to be all pliability and indulgence, after the truly considerate manner in which the explosion had conducted itself; and Betteredge was accordingly informed that we were all four to travel back together by the morning train. I fully expected that he would have asked leave to accompany us. But Rachel had wisely provided her faithful old servant with an occupation that interested him. He was charged with completing the refurnishing of the house, and was too full of his domestic responsibilities to feel the "detective-fever" as he might have felt it under other circumstances.

Our one subject of regret, in going to London, was the necessity of parting, more abruptly than we could have wished, with Ezra Jennings. It was impossible to persuade him to accompany us. I could only promise to write to him—and Rachel could only insist on his coming to see her when she returned to Yorkshire. There was every prospect of our meeting again in a few months—and yet there was something very sad in seeing our best and dearest friend left standing alone on the of platform at the train moved out of the station.

On our arrival in London, Mr. Bruff was accosted at the terminus by a small boy, dressed in a jacket and trowsers of threadbare black cloth, and personally remarkable in virtue of the extraordinary prominence of his eyes. They projected so far, and they rolled about so loosely, that you wondered uneasily why they remained in their sockets. After listening to the boy, Mr. Bruff asked the ladies whether they would excuse our accompanying them back to Portland Place. I had barely time to promise Rachel that I would return, and tell her every thing that had happened, before Mr. Bruff seized me by the arm and hurried me into a cab. The boy with the ill-secured eyes took his place on the box by the driver, and the driver was directed to go to Lombard Street.

"News from the bank?" I asked, as we started.

"News of Mr. Luker," said Mr. Bruff. "An hour ago he was seen to leave his house at Lambeth in a cab, accompanied by two men, who were recognized by my men as police-officers in plain clothes. If Mr. Luker's idea of the Indians is at the bottom of this precaution, the inference is plain enough. He is going to take the Diamond out of the bank."

"And we are going to the bank to see what comes of it?"

"Yes—or to hear what has come of it, if it is all over by this time. Did you notice my boy on the box there?"

"I noticed his eyes!"

Mr. Bruff laughed. "They call the poor little wretch 'Gooseberry' at the office," he said. "I employ him to go on errands—and I only wish my clerks who have nicknamed him were as thoroughly to be depended on as he is. Gooseberry is one of the sharpest boys in London, Mr. Blake, in spite of his eyes."

It was twenty minutes to five when we drew up before the bank in Lombard Street. Gooseberry looked longingly at his master as he opened the cab door.

"Do you want to come in too?" asked Mr. Bruff, kindly. "Come in then, and keep steady, and tell no further orders. He's as quick at fighting," pursued Mr. Bruff, addressing me in a whisper. "Two words will do with Gooseberry—he never would be wanted with another boy."

We entered the bank. The outer office—with the long counter, behind which the cashiers sat—was crowded with people, all waiting their turn to take money out, or to pay money in, before the bank closed at five o'clock.

Two men among the crowd approached Mr. Bruff as soon as he showed himself.

"Well," asked the lawyer. "Have you seen him?"

"He passed us here half an hour since, Sir, and went on into the inner office."

"Has he not come out again yet?"

"No, Sir."

Mr. Bruff turned to me. "Let us wait," he said.

I looked round among the people about me for the three Indians. Not a sign of them was to be seen any where. The only person present with a noticeably dark complexion was a tall man in a plaid coat, and a round hat, who looked like a sailor. Could this be one of them in disguise? Impossible! The man was taller than any of the Indians; and his face, where it was not hidden by a bushy black beard, was twice the breadth of any of their faces at least.

"They must have their spy somewhere," said Mr. Bruff, looking at the dark sailor in his turn. "And he may be the man."

Before he could say any more his cost-tail was respectfully pulled by his attendant sprite with the gooseberry eyes. Mr. Bruff looked where the boy was looking. "Hush!" he said. "Here is Mr. Luker!"

The money-lender came out from the inner regions of the bank, followed by his two guardian policemen in plain clothes.

"Keep your eye on him," whispered Mr. Bruff. "If he passes the Diamond to any body, he will pass it here."

Without noticing either of us, Mr. Luker slowly made his way to the door—now in the thickest, now in the thinnest part of the crowd. I distinctly saw his hand move as he passed a short, stout man, respectably dressed in a suit of sober gray. The man started a little, and looked after him. Mr. Luker moved on slowly through the crowd. At the door his guard placed themselves on either side of him. They were all three followed by one of Mr. Bruff's two men—and I saw them no more.

I looked round at the lawyer, and then looked significantly toward the man in the suit of sober gray. "Yes!" whispered Mr. Bruff, "I saw it too!" He turned about in search of his second man. The second man was nowhere to be seen. He looked behind him for his attendant sprite. Gooseberry had disappeared.

"What the devil does it mean!" said Mr. Bruff, angrily. "They have both left us at the very time when we want them most."

It came to the turn of the man in the gray suit to transact his business at the counter. He paid it a check—received a receipt for it—and turned to go out.

"What is to be done?" asked Mr. Bruff. "We can't degrade ourselves by following him."

"I can!" I said. "I wouldn't lose sight of that man for ten thousand pounds!"

"In that case," rejoined Mr. Bruff, "I wouldn't lose sight of you for twice the money. A nice occupation for a man in my position," he muttered to himself, as he followed the stranger out of the bank. "For Heaven's sake, don't mention it! I should be ruined if it was known."

The man in the gray suit got into an omnibus going westward. We got in after him. There were latent reserves of youth still left in Mr. Bruff. I assert it positively—when he took his seat in the omnibus he blushed!

The man with the gray suit stopped the omnibus and got out in Oxford Street. We followed him again. He went into a chemist's shop.

Mr. Bruff started. "My chemist!" he exclaimed. "I am done if we have made a mistake."

We entered the shop. Mr. Bruff and the proprietor exchanged a few words in private. The lawyer joined me again, with a very crest-fallen face.

"It's greatly to our credit," he said, as he took my arm and led me out—"that's one comfort!"

"What is to our credit?" I asked.

"Mr. Blake!" you and I are the two worst amateur detectives that ever tried their hands at the trade. The man in the gray suit has been thirty years in the chemist's service. He was sent to the bank to pay money to his master's account—and he knows no more of the Moonstone than the babe unborn."

I asked what was to be done next.

"Come back to my office," said Mr. Bruff. "Gooseberry and my second man have evidently followed somebody else. Let us hope that they had their eyes about them, at any rate!"

When we reached Gray's Inn Square the second man had arrived there before us. He had been waiting for more than a quarter of an hour.

"Well!" asked Mr. Bruff. "What's your news?"

"I am sorry to say, Sir," replied the man, "that I have made a mistake. I could have taken my oath that I saw Mr. Luker pass something to an elderly gentleman in a light-colored paletot. The elderly gentleman turns out, Sir, to be a most respectable master iron-monger in Eastcheap."

"Where is Gooseberry?" asked Mr. Bruff, resignedly.

The man stared. "I don't know, Sir. I have seen nothing of him since I left the bank."

Mr. Bruff dismissed the man. "One of two things," he said to me. "Either Gooseberry has run away, or he is hunting on his own account. What do you say to dining here, on the chance that the boy may come back in an hour or two? I have got some good wine in the cellar, and we can get a chop from the coffee-house."

We dined at Mr. Bruff's chambers. Before the cloth was removed "a person" was announced as wanting to speak to the lawyer. Was the person Gooseberry? No: only the man who had been employed to follow Mr. Luker when he left the bank.

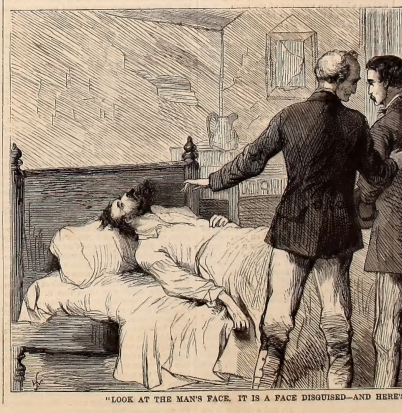
The report, in this case, presented no feature of the slightest interest. Mr. Luker had gone back to his own house, and had there dismissed his guard. He had not gone out again afterward. Toward dusk the shutters had been put up and the doors had been bolted. The street before the house, and the alley behind the house, had been carefully watched. No signs of the Indians had been visible. No person whatever had been seen loitering about the premises. Having stated these facts the man waited to know whether there were any further orders. Mr. Bruff dismissed him for the night.

"Do you think Mr. Luker has taken the Moonstone home with him?" I asked.

"No fear," said Mr. Bruff. "He would never have dismissed his two policemen if he had run the risk of keeping the Diamond in his own house again."

We waited another half hour for the boy, and waited in vain. It was then time for Mr. Bruff to go to Hampstead, and for me to return to Rachel in Portland Place. I left my card, in charge of the porter at the chambers, with a line written on it to say that I should be at my lodgings at half past ten that night. The card was to be given to the boy, if the boy came back.

Some men have a knack of keeping appointments; and other men have a knack of missing them. I am one of the other men. Add to this that I passed the evening at Portland Place, on the same seat with Rachel, in a room forty feet long, with Mrs. Merridew at the further end of it: Does anybody wonder that I got home at half past twelve instead of half past ten? How thoroughly heartless that petition was of mine! And how earnestly I hope I may never make that person's acquaintance!



My servant handed me a morsel of paper when he let me in.

I read, in a neat, legal handwriting, these words: "If you please, Sir, I am getting sleepy. I will come back to-morrow morning, between nine and ten." Inquiry proved that a boy, with very extraordinary-looking eyes, had called, had presented my card and message, had waited an hour, had done nothing but fall asleep and wake up again, had written a line for me, and had gone home—after gravely informing the servant that "he was fit for nothing unless he got his night's rest."

At nine the next morning I was ready for my visitor. At half past nine I heard steps outside my door. "Come in, Gooseberry!" I called out. "Thank you, Sir," answered a grave and melancholy voice. The door opened. I started to my feet and confronted—Sergeant Cuff!

"I thought I would look in here, Mr. Blake, on the chance of your being in town, before I wrote to Yorkshire," said the Sergeant.

He was as dreary and as lean as ever. His eyes had not lost their old trick (so subtly noticed in Betteredge's Narrative) of "looking as if they expected something more from you than you were aware of yourself." But, so far as dress can alter a man, the great Cuff was changed beyond all recognition. He wore a broad-brimmed white hat, a light shooting-jacket, white trowsers, and drab gaiters. He carried a stout oak stick. His whole aim and object seemed to be to look as if he had lived in the country all his life. When I complimented him on his Metamorphosis he declined to take it as a joke. He complained, quite gravely, of the noises and the smells of London. I declare I am far from sure that he did not speak with a slightly rustic accent! I offered him breakfast. The innocent countryman was quite shocked. His breakfast-hour was half past six—and he went to bed with the cocks and hens!

"I only got back from Ireland last night," said the Sergeant, coming round to the practical object of his visit, in his own impenetrable manner. "Before I went to bed I read your letter, telling me what has happened since my inquiry after the Diamond was suspended last year. There's only one thing to be said about the matter, on my side. I completely mistook my case. How any man living was to have seen things in their true light, in such a situation as mine was at the time, I don't profess to know. But that doesn't alter the facts as they stand. I own that I made a mess of it. Not the first mess, Mr. Blake, which has distinguished my professional career! It's only in books that the officers of the detective force are superior to the weakness of making a mistake."

"You have come in the nick of time to recover your reputation," I said.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Blake," rejoined the Sergeant. "Now I have retired from business I don't care a straw about my reputation. I have done with my reputation, thank God! I am here, Sir, in grateful remembrance of the late Lady Verinder's liberality to me. I will go back to my old work—if you want me, and if you will trust me—on that consideration, and on no other. Not a farthing of money is to pass, if you please, from you to me. This is on honor. Now tell me, Mr. Blake, how the case stands since you wrote to me last."

I told him of the experiment with the opium, and of what had occurred afterward at the bank in Lombard Street. He was greatly struck by the experiment—it was something entirely new in his experience. And he was particularly interested in the theory of Ezra Jennings, relating to what I had done with the Diamond, after I had left Rachel's sitting-room, on the birthday night.

"I don't hold with Mr. Jennings that you hid the Moonstone," said Sergeant Cuff. "But I agree with him that you must certainly have taken it back to your own room."

"Well?" I asked. "And what happened then?"

"Have you no suspicion yourself of what happened, Sir?"

"None whatever."

"Has Mr. Bruff no suspicion?"

"No more than I have."

Sergeant Cuff rose, and went to my writing-table. He came back with a sealed envelope. It was marked "Private;" it was addressed to me; and it had the Sergeant's signature in the corner.

"I suspected the wrong person last year," he said; "and I may be suspecting the wrong person now. Wait to open the envelope, Mr. Blake, till you have got at the truth; and then compare the name of the guilty person with the name that I have written in that sealed letter."

I put the letter into my pocket, and then asked for the Sergeant's opinion of the measures which we had taken at the bank.

"Very well intended, Sir," he answered, "and quite the right thing to do. But there was another person who ought to have been looked after besides Mr. Luker."

"The person named in the letter you have just given to me?"

"Yes, Mr. Blake, the person named in the letter. It can't be helped now. I shall have something to propose to you and Mr. Bruff, Sir, when the time comes. Let's wait, first, and see if the boy has any thing to tell us that is worth hearing."

It was close on ten o'clock, and the boy had not yet made his appearance. Sergeant Cuff talked of other matters. He asked after his old friend Betteredge, and his old enemy the gardener. In a minute more he would no doubt have got from this to the subject of his favorite roses, if my servant had not interrupted us by announcing that the boy was below.

On being brought into the room, Gooseberry stopped at the threshold of the door, and looked distrustfully at the stranger who was in my company. I called to the boy to come to me.

"You may speak before this gentleman," I said. "He is here to assist me; and he knows all that has happened. Sergeant Cuff," I added, "this is the boy from Mr. Bruff's office."

In our modern system of civilization, celebrity (no matter of what kind) is the lever that will move any thing. The fame of the great Cuff had even reached the ears of the small Gooseberry. The boy's ill-fixed eyes rolled, when I mentioned the illustrious name, till I thought they really must have dropped on the carpet.

"Come here, my lad," said the Sergeant, "and let's hear what you have got to tell us."

The notice of the great man—the hero of many a famous story in every lawyer's office in London—appeared to fascinate the boy. He placed himself in front of Sergeant Cuff, and put his hands behind him, after the approved fashion of a neophyte who is examined in his catechism.

"What is your name?" said the Sergeant, beginning with the first question in the catechism.

"Octavius Guy," answered the boy. "They call me Gooseberry at the office, because of my eyes."

"Octavius Guy, otherwise Gooseberry," pursued the Sergeant, with the utmost gravity, "you were missed at the bank yesterday. What were you about?"

"If you please, Sir, I was following a man."

"Who was he?"

"A tall man, Sir, with a big black beard, dressed like a sailor."

"I remember the man!" I broke in. "Mr. Bruff and I thought he was a spy, employed by the Indians."

Sergeant Cuff did not appear to be much impressed by what Mr. Bruff and I had thought. He went on catechising Gooseberry.

"Well?" he said—"and why did you follow the sailor?"

"If you please, Sir, Mr. Bruff wanted to know whether Mr. Luker passed any thing to any body on his way out of the bank. I saw Mr. Luker pass something to the sailor with the black beard."

"Why didn't you tell Mr. Bruff what you saw?"

"I hadn't time to tell any body, Sir, the sailor went out in such a hurry."

"And you ran out after him—eh?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Gooseberry," said the Sergeant, patting his head, "you have got something in that small skull of yours—and it isn't cotton-wool. I am greatly pleased with you, so far."

The boy blushed with pleasure. Sergeant Cuff went on.

"Well? and what did the sailor do, when he got into the street?"

"He called a cab, Sir."

"And what did you do?"

"Held on behind, and run after it."

Before the Sergeant could put his next question, another visitor was announced—the head clerk from Mr. Bruff's office.

Feeling the importance of not interrupting Sergeant Cuff's examination of the boy, I received the clerk in another room. He came with bad news of his employer. The agitation and excitement of the last two days had proved too much for Mr. Bruff. He had awoke that morning with an attack of gout; he was confined to his room at Hampstead; and, in the present critical condition of our affairs, he was very uneasy at being compelled to leave me without the advice and assistance of an experienced person. The chief clerk had received orders to hold himself at my disposal, and was willing to do his best to replace Mr. Bruff.

I wrote at once to quiet the old gentleman's mind, by telling him of Sergeant Cuff's visit: adding that Gooseberry was at that moment under examination; and promising to inform Mr. Bruff, either personally or by letter, of whatever might occur later in the day. Having dispatched the clerk to Hampstead with my note, I returned to the room which I had left, and found Sergeant Cuff at the fire-place, in the act of ringing the bell.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Blake," said the Sergeant. "I was just going to send word by your servant that I wanted to speak to you. There isn't a doubt on my mind that this boy—this most meritorious boy," added the Sergeant, patting Gooseberry on the head, "has followed the right man. Precious time has been lost, Sir, through your unfortunately not being at home at half past ten last night. The only thing to do, now, is to send for a cab immediately."

In five minutes more Sergeant Cuff and I (with Gooseberry on the box to guide the driver) were on our way eastward, toward the City.

"One of these days," said the Sergeant, pointing through the front window of the cab, "that boy will do great things in my late profession. He is the brightest and cleverest little chap I have met with for many a long year past. You shall hear the substance, Mr. Blake, of what he told me while you were out of the room. You were present, I think, when he mentioned that he held on behind the cab, and ran after it?"

"Yes."

"Well, Sir, the cab went from Lombard Street to the Tower Wharf. The sailor with the black beard got out, and spoke to the steward of the Rotterdam steamboat, which was to start the next morning. He asked if he could be allowed to go on board at once, and sleep in his berth overnight. The steward said, No. The cabins, and berths, and bedding were all to have a thorough cleaning that evening, and no passenger could be allowed to come on board before the morning. The sailor turned round, and left the wharf. When he got into the street again the boy noticed, for the first time, a man dressed like a respectable mechanic, walking on the opposite side of the road, and apparently keeping the sailor in view. The sailor stopped at an eating-house in the neighborhood, and went in. The boy—not being able to make up his mind at the moment—hung about among some other boys, staring at the good things in the eating-house window. He noticed the mechanic, waiting, as he himself was waiting—but still on the opposite side of the street. After a minute a cab came by slowly, and stopped where the mechanic was standing. The boy could only see plainly one person in the cab, who leaned forward at the window to speak to the mechanic. He described that person, Mr. Blake, without any prompting from me, as having a dark face, like the face of an Indian."

It was plain, by this time, that Mr. Bruff and I had made another mistake. The sailor with the black beard was clearly not a spy in the service of the Indian conspiracy. Was he, by any possibility, the man who had got the Diamond?

"After a little," pursued the Sergeant, "the cab moved on slowly down the street. The mechanic crossed the road, and went into the eating-house. The boy waited outside till he was hungry and tired—and then went into the eating-house, in his turn. He had a shilling in his pocket; and he dined sumptuously, he tells me, on a black pudding, an eel-pie, and a bottle of ginger-beer. What can a boy not digest? The substance in question has never been found yet."

"What did he see in the eating-house?" I asked.

"Well, Mr. Blake, he saw the sailor reading the newspaper at one table, and the mechanic reading the newspaper at another. It was dusk before the sailor got up and left the place. He looked about him suspiciously when he got out into the street. The boy—being a boy—passed unnoticed. The mechanic had not come out yet. The sailor walked on, looking about him, and apparently not very certain of where he was going next. The mechanic appeared once more, on the opposite side of the road. The sailor went on, till he got to Shore Lane, leading into Lower Thames Street. There he stopped before a public house under the sign of The Wheel of Fortune, and, after examining the place outside, went in. Gooseberry went in too. There were a great many people, mostly of the decent sort, at the bar. The Wheel of Fortune is a very respectable house, Mr. Blake; famous for its porter and pork-pies."

The Sergeant's digressions irritated me. He saw it, and confined himself more strictly to Gooseberry's evidence when he went on.

"The sailor," he resumed, "asked if he could have a bed. The landlord said 'No; they were full.' The barmaid corrected him, and said 'Number Ten was empty.' A waiter was sent for to show the sailor to Number Ten. Just before that, Gooseberry had noticed the mechanic among the people at the bar. Before the waiter had answered the call, the mechanic had vanished. The sailor was taken off to his room. Not knowing what to do next, Gooseberry had the wisdom to wait and see if any thing happened. Something did happen. The landlord was called for. Angry voices were heard up stairs. The mechanic suddenly made his appearance again, collared by the landlord, and exhibiting, to Gooseberry's great surprise, all the signs and tokens of being drunk. The landlord thrust him out at the door, and threatened him with the police if he came back. From the altercation between them, while this was going on, it appeared that the man had been discovered in Number Ten, and had declared with drunken obstinacy that he had taken the room. Gooseberry was so struck by this sudden intoxication of a previously sober person, that he couldn't resist running out after the mechanic into the street. As long as he was in sight of the public house, the man reeled about in the most disgraceful manner. The moment he turned the corner of the street he recovered his balance instantly, and became as sober a member of society as you could wish to see. Gooseberry went back to The Wheel of Fortune in a very bewildered state of mind. He waited about again, on the chance of something happening. Nothing happened; and nothing more was to be heard or seen of the sailor. Gooseberry decided on going back to the office. Just as he came to this conclusion, who should appear, on the opposite side of the street as usual, but the mechanic again! He looked up at one particular window at the top of the public house, which was the only one that had a light in it. The light seemed to relieve his mind. He left the place directly. The boy made his way back to Gray's Inn, got your card and message, called, and failed to find you. There you have the state of the case, Mr. Blake, as it stands at the present time."

"What is your opinion of the case, Sergeant?"

"I think it's serious, Sir. Judging by what the boy saw the Indians are in it, to begin with."

"Yes. And the sailor is evidently the man to whom Mr. Luker passed the Diamond. It seems odd that Mr. Bruff and I, and the man in Mr. Bruff's employment, should all have been mistaken about who the person was."

"Not at all, Mr. Blake. Considering the risk that person ran it's likely enough that Mr. Luker purposely misled you by previous arrangement between them."

"Do you understand the proceedings at the public house?" I asked. "The man dressed like a mechanic was acting, of course, in the employment of the Indians. But I am as much puzzled to account for his sudden assumption of drunkenness as Gooseberry himself."

"I think I can give a guess at what it means, Sir," said the Sergeant. "If you will reflect you will see that the man must have had some pretty strict instructions from the Indians. They were far too noticeable themselves to risk being seen at the bank, or in the public house—they were obliged to trust every thing to their deputy. Very good. Their deputy hears a certain number named in the public house as the number of the room which the sailor is to have for the night—that being also the room (unless our notion is all wrong) which the Diamond is to have for the night too. Under those circumstances the Indians, you may rely on it, would insist on having a description of the room—of its position in the house, of its capability of being approached from the outside, and so on. What was the man to do, with such orders as these? Just what he did! He ran up stairs to get a look at the room before the sailor was taken into it. He was found there, making his observations—and he shammed drunk as the easiest way of getting out of the difficulty. That's how I read the riddle. After he was turned out of the public house he probably went with his report to the place where his employers were waiting for him. And his employers, no doubt, sent him back to make sure that the sailor was really settled at the public house till the next morning. As for what happened at The Wheel of Fortune, after the boy left, we ought to have discovered that last night. It's eleven in the morning now. We must hope for the best and find out what we can."

In a quarter of an hour more the cab stopped in Shore Lane, and Gooseberry opened the door for us to get out.

"All right?" asked the Sergeant.

"All right," answered the boy.

The moment we entered The Wheel of Fortune it was plain, even to my inexperienced eyes, that there was something wrong in the house.

The only person behind the counter at which the liquors were served was a bewildered servant girl, perfectly ignorant of the business. One or two customers, waiting for their morning drink, were tapping impatiently on the counter with their money. The barmaid appeared from the inner regions of the parlor, excited and preoccupied. She answered Sergeant Cuff's inquiry for the landlord by telling him sharply that her master was up stairs, and was not to be bothered by any body.

"Come along with me, Sir," said Sergeant Cuff, coolly leading the way up stairs, and beckoning to the boy to follow him.

The barmaid called to her master, and warned him that strangers were intruding themselves into the house. On the first-floor we were encountered by the landlord, hurrying down, in a highly irritated state, to see what was the matter.

"Who the devil are you? and what do you want here?" he asked.

"Keep your temper," said the Sergeant, quietly. "I'll tell you who I am, to begin with. I am Sergeant Cuff."

The illustrious name instantly produced its effect. The angry landlord threw open the door of a sitting-room, and asked the Sergeant's pardon.

"I am annoyed and out of sorts, Sir—that's the truth," he said. "Something unpleasant has happened in the house this morning. A man in my way of business has a deal to upset his temper, Sergeant Cuff."

"Not a doubt of it," said the Sergeant. "I'll come at once, if you will allow me, to what brings us here. This gentleman and I want to trouble you with a few inquiries, on a matter of some interest to both of us."

"Relating to what, Sir?" asked the landlord.

"Relating to a dark man, dressed like a sailor, who slept here last night."

"Good God! that's the man who is upsetting the whole house at this moment!" exclaimed the landlord. "Do you, or does this gentleman, know any thing about him?"

"We can't be certain till we see him," answered the Sergeant.

"See him?" echoed the landlord. "That's the one thing that nobody has been able to do since seven o'clock this morning. That was the time when he left word, last night, that he was to be called. He was called—and there was no getting an answer from him. They tried again at eight, and they tried again at nine. No use! There was the door still locked—and not a sound to be heard in the room! I have been out this morning—and I only got back a quarter of an hour ago. I have hammered at the door myself—and all to no purpose. The pot-boy has gone to fetch a carpenter. If you can wait a few minutes, gentlemen, we will have the door opened, and see what it means."

"Was the man drunk last night?" asked Sergeant Cuff.

"Perfectly sober, Sir—or I would never have let him sleep in my house."

"Did he pay for his bed beforehand?"

"No."

"Could he leave the room in any way, without going out by the door?"

"The room is a garret," said the landlord. "But there's a trap-door in the ceiling, leading out on to the roof—and a little lower down the street there's an empty house under repair. Do you think, Sergeant, the blackguard has got off in that way, without paying?"

"A sailor," said Sergeant Cuff, "might have done it—early in the morning, before the street was astir. He would be used to climbing, and his head wouldn't fail him on the roofs of the houses."

As he spoke the arrival of the carpenter was announced. We all went up stairs, at once, to the top story. I noticed that the Sergeant was unusually grave, even for him. It also struck me as odd that he told the boy (after having previously encouraged him to follow us), to wait in the room below till we came down again.

The carpenter's hammer and chisel disposed of the resistance of the door in a few minutes. But some article of furniture had been placed against it inside, as a barricade. By pushing at the door we thrust this obstacle aside, and so got admission to the room. The landlord entered first; the Sergeant second; and I third. The other persons present followed us.

We all looked toward the bed, and all started.

The man had not left the room. He lay, dressed, on the bed, with a white pillow over his face, which completely hid it from view.

"What does that mean?" said the landlord, pointing to the pillow.

Sergeant Cuff led the way to the bed, without answering, and removed the pillow.

The man's swarthy face was placid and still; his black hair and beard were slightly, very slightly discomposed. His eyes stared wide open, glassy and vacant, at the ceiling. The filmy look and the fixed expression of them horrified me. I turned away, and went to the open window. The rest of them remained, where Sergeant Cuff remained, at the bed.

"He's in a fit!" I heard the landlord say.

"He's dead," the Sergeant answered. "Send for the nearest doctor, and send for the police."

The waiter was dispatched on both errands. Some strange fascination seemed to hold Sergeant Cuff to the bed. Some strange curiosity seemed to keep the rest of them waiting to see what the Sergeant would do next.

I turned again to the window. The moment afterward I felt a soft pull at my coat-tails, and a small voice whispered, "Look here, Sir!"

Goosebery had followed us into the room. His loose eyes rolled frightfully—not in terror, but in exultation. He had made a detective discovery on his own account. "Look here, Sir," he repeated—and led me to a table in a corner of the room.

On the table stood a little wooden box open and empty. On one side of the box lay some jeweler's cotton. On the other side was a torn sheet of white paper, with a seal on it, partly destroyed, and with an inscription in writing, which was still perfectly legible. The inscription was in these words:

"Deposited with Messrs. Bushe, Lyraguth, and Bushe, by Mr. Septimus Barker of Middlesex Place, Lambeth, a small wooden box, sealed up in this envelope, and containing a valuable of great price. The box, when claimed, to be only given up by Messrs. Bushe and Co. on the personal application of Mr. Luker."

Those lines covered all further doubt on one point at least. The sailor had been in possession of the Moonstone when he had left the bank on the previous day.

I felt another pull at my-coat-tails. Goosebery had not done with me yet.

"Robbery!" whispered the boy, pointing, in high delight, to the empty box.

"You are right," I said. "Now go away!"

"Go away!"

"And Murder!" added Gooseberry, pointing, with a horror relish all, to the mark on the bed.

There was something so hideous in the boy's enjoyment of the horror of the scene that I took him by the two shoulders and put him out of the room.

At the moment when I crossed the threshold of the door Lieut. Sergeant Cuff's voice asking where I was. He met me, as I returned into the room, and forced me to go back with him to the bedside.

"Mr. Blake!" he said. "Look at the man's face. It is a face disguised—and here's the proof of it!"

He traced with his finger a thin line of livid white, running backward from the dead man's forehead, through the swarthy complexion, to the slightly-disturbed black hair. "Let's see what is under this," said the Sergeant, suddenly seizing the black hair with a firm grip of his hand.

My nerves were not strong enough to bear it. I turned away from the bed.

The first sight that met my eyes, at the other end of the room, was the irrepressible Gooseberry, perched on a chair, and looking, with breathless interest, over the heads of his elders, at the Sergeant's proceedings.

"He's got a wig on!" whispered Gooseberry, compassionating my position, as the only person in the room who could see nothing.

There was a pause—and then a cry of astonishment among the people round the bed.

"He's pulled off his beard!" cried Gooseberry.

There was another pause. Sergeant Cuff seemed to be soothing. The landlord went to the washhand-stand, and returned to the bed with a basin of water and a towel.

Gooseberry danced with excitement on the chair. "Come up here, along with me, Sir! He's washing off the complexion."

The Sergeant suddenly burst his way through the people about him, and came, with horror in his face, back to the place where I was standing.

"Come back to the bed, Sir!" he began. He looked at me closer, and checked himself. "No!" he resumed. "Open the sealed letter first—the letter I gave you this morning."

I opened the letter.

"Read the name, Mr. Blake, that I have written inside."

I read the name that he had written. It was —Godfrey Ablewhite.

"Now," said the Sergeant, "come with me and look at the man on the bed."

I went with him, and looked at the man on the bed.

GODFREY ABLEWHITE!

PETER CAGGER.

In the sudden death of PETER CAGGER, which occurred in this city during the session of the Democratic Convention, New York has lost a gentleman who was one of the representative men of the State. Mr. CAGGER was fifty-two years of age. He was born in Albany. He was educated at Chambly (Canada), under the well-known Abbé MIGNAULT, and graduated at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland. He was married before he was twenty years of age, and soon immediately a prominent position in the legal profession and in politics. He held a controlling influence in the party for nearly thirty-years, and yet always refused office, and kept absolutely aloof from the lobby and its schemes, or interfered only to prevent them. The large interests property of the VAN RENSSELAERS passed into his hands, with accumulated rents, and complicated by wasteful and petty conveyances of long standing. He had the skill and energy to settle the litigation to the satisfaction of all parties. In social life he was the most genial, refined, and delightful of men; proverbial for his amiability, and possessed of a temper never known to have been ruffled. His fidelity to his friends, irrespective of party relations or religious belief, has been known and experienced, for a quarter of a century, by the controlling minds of every county in the State. His hand was "open as day to melting charity," and benevolence to the poor, the widow and the orphan, was one of the notable, as it was one of the most charming, of his many excellent qualities. His funeral from St. Joseph's Church was attended with all the pomp of ceremonial that the Catholic Church accords to the dead; and the demonstration of popular feeling on the occasion was one of the most remarkable tributes ever rendered in a private citizen.

A SEA-SHELL.

Coot, lips of shell, sing, Sea-shell, warm and sweet,
Of ripples cutting on the creamy beach,
Of soft waves rocking, of sea-gull's cry,
Small wavelets kissing one another's feet,
Where flakes of foam make music, a low speech
Tenderly to hear.

Tell me of half-formed little broken words
Sung by the ripples to the still sea-flowers
In silent depths where useless pearls are;
For there the flowers have voices like to birds,
That sing fall-throated in this world of ours
On each melodious tree.

Not now, not now, sweet shell, some other day
Tell me of sighings on the lonely shore,
And seas that sob to lands that moan above;
Tell me not now of earth grown weak and gray,
Nor longing for the things that come no more,
Nor stay broken love.

To me thy breathing hears another tone,
Of fresh and current currents running under sea,
And happy laughter of the ripples spray:
Ah! hearest thou the words that are thine own,
Know'st thou the music that they bear to me
The things they seem to say?

Ah, Sea-shell, it is this: "The soft blue deep,
Which holds within a heart that knows her and is kind;
Sighed for thy sorrow, now it laughs with thee;
Love is a secret which man can not keep,
Hide it from heaven and from the restless wind,
But trust it with the sea."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Now that many clergymen are recruiting their exhausted energies in their native country places, and at the same time pondering upon the welfare of their flocks, and devising means whereby social and public and religious worship may be rendered both pleasant and profitable, a few sketches of a Methodist revival prevailing may give some hints. This prayer-meeting was one of many held by the Young Men's Christian Associations at their fifteenth International Convention, lately convened at Detroit. It was a morning meeting, and was conducted by a clergyman of Brooklyn. He made no long speech or prayer; but read a part of the Bible, and made a few remarks that he wished to direct attention to the need of seeking the "power" mentioned in the eighth verse; a single verse of a Bible-reading that another exceeded the reading and remarks, and the meeting was open. Many short prayers were then made, but more that did not average more than two minutes each in length. Every man who rose to speak and pray was not cantarious, although four or five often rose at once—but one single point to state and illustrate; and when he had done his say he sat down and was instantly followed by another. There were also many stanzas of hymns sung—hymns that were new to a time, but always well sung. Such a meeting is inspiring. Can not such like be established in our cities, for early gatherings which often are a reservance to the flesh and spirit of the well-trained Christian? Then, no minister will be obliged to rise and again in his prayer-meeting, "Brethren, there is still opportunity for remarks?"

The curious, mysterious, electric, magnetic, ephitrialistic, or whatever it may be, toy, "Planchette," is wonderfully interesting to society. The word "Planchette" means "a little board," and the instrument known by that name is a heart-shaped piece made of wood, but sometimes of glass or rubber, about four inches by five in size, mounted upon two castors, and the third support being a lead-pencil, which passes through the apex of the heart. "Planchette" appears to be of very ancient origin, and is said to have been brought to this country some years ago, when our country was first occupied in a large degree with the mounts of contending armies to spend much time in games. There is no science in regard to the remarkable little companion; but the commonly received belief in regard to its action is, that if two persons place their fingers lightly upon the little table, touching it merely with the tips of the fingers, and ask a question mentally, the table will move in various and that after a while it will write out the answer by the "planchette" in a pencil, without any perceptional impulse being given by those who touch it. Undoubtedly, if in any case Planchette moves without being touched, or even designedly impelled by the operators, the influence may be magnetic; but how far we have any right to go beyond that assuming from its extraordinary specimens of chirography. Nevertheless certain questions are told of the spirit-world answers which are extorted from this "little board" and as the directions for the game say that "by possibly, the company may experience some of the lady and a gentleman, Planchette is likely to be a favorite amusement in our social circles in country resorts. It has been humorously proposed to construct a Planchette with a lead-pencil-box, with a wick and two, exchanging the lead-pencil for a guiding-wheel, and that of a rudder. The inventor, however will, of course, be supplied by those who ride, their hands resting lightly upon a platform raised in front of them. The velocity attained by the vehicle is said to be now convenient for a runaway couple!

Some ingenious Parisian absurdities have recently been introduced into that country, though as yet they are but little known. A lady, for instance, will wear a carved and gilt fan in her hair, with accompanying wings and movable bill, which keep up a constant motion in every direction. A gay lady of the most stylish gentleman will display a scarf-pin consisting of a negro's head carved and painted in accurate imitation of the African features. Suddenly the scarf-pin begins to roll its eyes and chatter with its jaws. In each instance the mechanism is connected with a small electrical battery—which, in case of the scarf-pin, is carried in the vest-pocket, and of the bird concealed in the folds of the hair.

It is said that the eggs of the locust are deadly poison; and a traveler dying in Georgia is reported to have been fatally poisoned by using a twig for a tooth-brush which had been found on a locust-tree's egge. Also in Tennessee six boys—three white and three black—were poisoned by eating roasted locusts from eating the berries in which the locusts had deposited their eggs.

A very extraordinary "bear-story" is related by a Michigan paper. A little girl, whose home was near a bear-wood, had apparently nothing could be found of her whereabouts for thirty-six hours. Bear-tracks were found in the vicinity, and it was supposed that she had been carried off and devoured. A neighbor, who was searching for her, thought he heard a child's voice in the bear-wood, and, on listening, asked her to come to him. She replied that the bear would not let her. The man then crept through the brush, and when near the spot where the child and bear were, discovered that the bear was dead, which the child said was the bear. They found her standing upon a log extending about half-way across the river. The bear had attempted to cross the river on the log, and being closely pursued, left the child and swam away. She had received some scratches, and her clothes were almost torn from her body; but apparently the bear had not bitten her. The child was only seven years old.

The "seventeen-year locusts" are ravaging the forests of Indiana. They do not appear to injure the fruit trees or vegetables, preferring the forest trees. They are about two inches long, with a large, round head, black body, red eyes, and gauzy, transparent wings. It is said by naturalists that this is not a locust at all, differing from it in many particulars, especially in not having the power of leaping. These insects do appear once in seventeen years, however. On their wing-covers is a distinctly marked W, which the superstitious suppose to indicate approaching war. They have appeared in some of the Middle States.

The Canadian Government has decided to erect an executive mansion for the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, at Toronto. The building the house has been given out at $37,675. The work is to be completed by the first part of next year.

The New York Journal of Music relates a remarkable instance of the triumph of music over delirium, which we hardly credulous. Some time since a while, looking man rushed into one of the rooms of the Howard Mission, exclaiming, "I'm a fearful Gardiner here" (referring to Orville Gardiner, a reformed drunkard and gambler, once noted in New York). Being answered in the negative, he exclaimed, "Then I was lost in" and drawing a knife from under his vest, he continued, "I had him signed, and Mr. Van Rensselaer forward and caught his arm. Attempts to wrest the knife from him were in vain; the unfortunate man was seized with a fit of delirium tremens, and became unmanageable. A gentleman who was present, not knowing what to do, sat down to the instrument, and began to play and sing, "Come, ye dilesonsolate." The effect was magical. The maniac became quieter and as other hymns were sung he sat down and sobbed like a child. A cup of strong coffee quieted his nerves, and soon he seemed to have completely subdued the use of his faculties. For some time all efforts to accompany the words with the tune failed; but at length he was found to be a resident of Hartford, a wealthy man engaged in the Sabbath-school and in temperance work, who had fallen into dissipation, with the above result. Christian friends received a helping hand, and he regained his former position in society by a complete reform.

Ministers generally have the good sense to moderate the length of their sermons during the dog-day heat. But the Boston preacher who, on a hot Sunday, after reading the Ninth Commandment, began to expatiate from his face, went on even though he felt that a shirt one, and preached fifty minutes, ought to expect an empty house during a hot season of the year.

"It is a truth well known among observers of human nature that men who constantly drink liquor in private to excess are generally ashamed of the fact, and those who drink in summer to keep cool are most sensitive to heat." So very justly remarks an exchange.

Silk-worms' eggs, of late years, have been extensively imported from Japan to Italy, in order to repair the losses sustained by disease among the Italian worms. And though Italian silk-growers have hardly yet recently, great complaints have prevailed as to the failure of the Japanese breed. On investigation it appears that a great deal of fraud has consisted in the sale of eggs of the Japanese breed. Quantities of these eggs have been sent here and elsewhere by a Milan house. These papers are duly stamped and indorsed in Japanese characters, and the Japanese name mark usually put on them at Yeddo on their way to the Italian market. Beyond a doubt these papers were intended to receive Italian eggs, which would be sold to the public as genuine Japanese—a fine deception on the silk eggs on which is now based a hope of reviving the silk culture in Italy. Doubtless there are many Japanese merchants engaged honestly, and there are business firms, we are happy to believe, who conduct their affairs in a just, true, and honorable principles. But they are rare, as in this one hesitate where and who to trust. And every little while some fraud is brought to light which the public has been barely deceived. A week or two ago the Custom-House authorities in New York found that the confidential clerk of a prominent business firm in Boston removed by him, that "it was impossible to do business in the ordinary way, and yet follow the teachings of Christ." Whether the remark was based on actual facts in the general sense or not, I indicate that there are great evils to be remedied, and that honorable principles are the responsible guardians.

Economy is a valuable trait of character. Two men lately undressed and attempted to swim across the Connecticut River at Monlague to save their coats toll. They tied their clothes about their necks, and one of them, finding that the clothes were too heavy, had to untie it, and it floated away down the river. Then a new suit.

The Natchez (Tennessee) Banner relates a wonderful story of a wonderful serpent, which has recently made a public exhibition of himself, much to the alarm of all beholders. Those who were favored with a sight of the monster allowed him, unmolested but very slowly, to retreat to his den. Then the crowds which occupied, with stoppages, some hours. The snake was estimated to be forty feet long, and about forty inches in diameter. After he retreated to his lair the monster was killed and painted in oranges, and then a strong box fifty feet long was made, one open end of which the serpent first into his snakeship's box. They hope to capture him. This is the substance of the story; and it is said that the creature has been seen several times before during the last twenty-five years.

During the hottest weather the Parisians in general close the outside shutters of their windows, and sit in darkened rooms until five o'clock; then a few venture out to the Bois de Boulogne, returning at half past seven. At eight all the fashionable world dine, and then they go once more to the Bois, and remain there till midnight. Parisians literally turn night into day and in a state, as a celebrated author once remarked, the Emperor and Empress have been enjoying their leisure at Fontainebleau, in their own fashion. They take especial delight in dining in the forest. They do not, however, have picnic dinners on the ground, where cold meats, smashed pies, and pea-gravel, but a large, stately dinner-table is laid out, and Count Mayerling, the steward of the Imperial household and luxury, just as though they were in their palaces. And entered among the silver dishes, and through the crystal vases, tumblers, bright and dazzling with primatic colors, cover the well-served table; nothing is wanting. Between the Count and the Empress sits under the large trees near the castle. For these pleasure-parties the Count has "a service of china expressly for the country," made either of metallic or buff enamel, or of white porcelain, embroidered with a border of green called chêne de bane. Originally muslin was a favorite material at this Turkish entertainment.

I undressed myself, and came, with horror in his face, back to the place where I was standing.

THE BRITISH LION DISARMED.

"The United States and England are united by too many bonds to make war possible; but for myself I am anxious to have every point in dispute amicably settled, and the two countries may then become one in policy, as they already are, I firmly believe, in sentiment and origin."—Prince of Wales's Remarks to Mr. Bierstadt, the Artist.

A WOMAN'S JUSTICE.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"DRAW up the blind a little higher, Cecil," murmured the peevish, fretful, and complaining voice of Gerald Middleton. "Light, light—now it is too high! Do you not see how the evening sun comes streaming in, enough to ruin stronger eyes than mine. I think that is better—no, it is not —there, let it alone! I'll do it myself." The invalid attempted to rise from the sofa, but his sister exclaimed: "You must not move, dear Gerald! have a little patience, and I will set it right."

"Patience!" he repeated, petulantly, "I think I have patience, I ought to have patience—I have patience—live on patience. You and that stupid nurse are just alike; you have two pairs of left hands between you, and do nothing right. Can't you let the blind alone? Now it is darkness entering. Ring the bell for South; but for South I should have been dead long ago. You and nurse Graves would have killed me." "Graves!" It was a bit of refined cruelty in you, Cecil, to engage a woman with that suggestive name; you had better advertise me of the name of Funeral—Nurse Funeral—a good joke, faith! only Funeral should precede and not follow Graves—eh, Cecil?"

There was no reply; his sister was persevering in her endeavor to arrange the blind, looking back at every moment to see if the sunshine was shielded from the invalid's eyes as the clock on the chimney-piece, that told it was a quarter past six.

"And what is the matter with her son? Fever, or small-pox, or diphtheria, I suppose? One of the cursed things she will be sure to bring me. How word for all; listen to me, Cecil, that woman shall not return."

"If you please, Sir"—began South.

"Not one word! I have said it; no one with common-sense would permit a nurse to visit a sick one who is living in a back alley; but I am surrounded by fools—you need not color up, Cecil; do not let your temper break out in that way. I wonder you have not some fellow-feeling. I wish you do not care how you agitate me. It was clear insanity to permit that woman to go to her son—in typhus fever; was it typhus or small-pox you said, South?"

The question induced South to make a bolt at the truth.

"Neither, Sir; he is going to be married to-morrow; him and his young woman live at Hichmond, on top of the hill; and as the old man said, could not go to the wedding to-morrow, they both came to get her blessing, Sir; that was all."

"Pair of idiots!" exclaimed the invalid, more irritated by the explanation than by the response to his surmises. "I wonder you are not ashamed to repeat such trash, South; as if a Christian could attend such tomfooley! Marry! and what have they to live on, what have they to starve on? Can't you answer?"

"He is head-gardener to Sir James Lacy, Sir—eighty pounds a year, and his cottage, and milk, and vegetables, and coal, and she is such a pretty girl."

"They have not been in this house?" Major Middleton's eyes—they were steel-blue, and flashed uncomfortably when he was irritated—glistened.

"No, Sir! oh, not a step in it; they walked up and down outside until Mrs. Graves asked my mistress for half an hour's leave, and I saw her as she passed the pantry window."

If a look could have killed poor South, his days would have been numbered. The major looked at him with deep and deadly scorn.

"Saw who?" he snarled. "The nurse?"

"No, Sir, the pretty girl."

"South, you are an idle scoundrel!" exclaimed the Major, fast working himself into a state of irritability that was certain to end in a paroxysm of coughing, always dreaded by his patient sister.

"I say you are an idle scoundrel," he repeated; "instead of attending to me, to spend your time, at your time of life, watching a trapesing girl and talking to me—me! of marri—"

The word seized on and shook every fibre of his attenuated frame; Cecil pressed her hands on his brow, while South lifted him higher and still higher on the sofa; at last the paroxysm was over, and the poor, irritable sufferer struggled, first faintly, then became pale, and panted, until able to take some soothing medicine, and in a few minutes lulled him to sleep. His sister and his servant watched him without moving, until at length Miss Middleton sank noiselessly into a seat and pointed to the door. South crept stealthily out of the room, and after a time, when assured that her brother really slept, Miss Middleton drew a letter from her bosom and began unfolding it on her lap; but the paper rustled, and would give that inexplicable sound, which is more disturbing to an invalid than positive noise. Cecil ceased, and put the thin sheet of letter paper into her pocket; then bent forward and clasped her hands on her lap.

Let us pause and look at her; you will hardly be content with a passing glance at Cecil Middleton. There is a fascination about her possessed but by few who are considered beautiful, if you observe the loving and up-looking meaning in her large dark eyes; the often tremulous motion of her well-formed lips, which, when they speak, call up more dimples than you can count; the oval of her firm yet womanly face, and the dignity of her brow, tempered at that moment by the sympathy she felt for a brother who had caused her much sorrow and done her much wrong! If you take in all this, as you may do in a couple of minutes, you will want to know her; and when you know her, be you man or woman, you must love her. I do not mean that, being a man, you earn "fall," as it is vulgarly called, "in love" with her; but you would receive her into your heart as you would a thought new and pure, a holy inspiration; and you would be happy in her society, and seek to earn her good opinion, seeing that neither envy nor jealousy disturbed her; you would even make her your confidant and talk freely to her of the girl you hoped to marry, and she would be the best to confess you in that love, and without any profession would counsel you as if she were your sister; and while she laughed and jested and conversed with children they would look into her eyes and believe in her as if she were their own mother, and tell her all their troubles, which would vanish beneath the influence of her sympathy.

Her voice is low, and soft, and clear. Her head is bent, as it now is, above the hair of her dark, waving hair, which is folded round the head and then coiled at the back into a soft knot, the ends falling in curls over the neck.

After a time she ceases to look at Major Middleton, and it seems as though her inquiring eyes were seeking to read the future in the quiet plain enough; there are not six, no, not three months' life in her brother, whose sleep might now be called unconscious, for the sharp paroxysm is a sob wrestling against the disease that seeks to stifle life. When her brother no longer lives Cecil will be his heiress.

Major Middleton dying without children his sister becomes mistress of Middleton Lea and three thousand a year. Not only so, but she would be compelled to live on the interest of her own four or five thousand pounds. But there is no danger of that. Cecil, young, and handsome and patient of sisters, though she knows that Gerald, if he desired to do so, has not the power to will away the property entailed on her. All his life he has been tyrannical and exacting in the cruelest manner. Cecil possesses a selfish man, though a brave soldier; not extravagant; quite generous, even to himself; it is needless, now, when he is dying, to say that his hard nature, paralyzed, if it did not break, the heart of his widowed mother; and how he, who could have been his sister's friend and guide, kept her back instead of helping her on to the attainment of the one desire of her full, pure heart.

As she sat there, the light of the sun had never dimmed or changed, and then casting pitying glances at the brother whom, though she did not love or trust, she served, Cecil gathered and shaded her rendered his national accent almost imperceptible when he spoke quietly, his tone and a peculiar idiom often betrayed the Highlander land.

"I'll go in and sit by the master, miss, if you'll please to let me—there's one below wanting you."

"Wanting me, South? Surely you said I could not leave my brother?"

"Indeed, think, I did, miss."

"South! After my orders!"

"Go and see, miss."

Cecil looked at the old servant, and at once knew who it was that "wanted her."

She moved forward; but, as if struck by sudden blindness, her hand went to her left hand.

"Oh, dear mistress, keep a good heart! I never saw him look better nor handsomer; the first look at him will warm your heart."

"God bless her!" he murmured to himself, as, leaving overcome her momentary weakness, she passed down the stairs, at first hesitatingly, then swiftly. "God bless her! it's the world's wonder she is, if the world only knew it. Well, there's life-long happiness in store for her, that's a comfort; though I'll be sorry for the poor master, too, poisoned as he is with fair wickedness. Something should be done for him, and have turned his blood into gall long ever ago, or he could not have done what he does! I shouldn't like, for one, to have the keeping now of half a heart after the life leaves it!" And he glided into the sick man's room.

CHAPTER II.

CECIL MIDDLETON and Ronald Chester had not met for several months; and letters are but cold expressions of feelings. Two sane monements before either could speak; but the pressure of heart to heart, in the clasp of strong and tender love, was expressed in more than words. The disappointing past was forgotten; but not by the ecstasy of reunion. Whatever trials they had undergone, or misunderstandings, all—mistrust —had never poisoned their affection, never existed in dreams disturbed their faith each in the other. Let what would come their eternal love could not even end in this life, for they enjoyed the happiness of believing that a pure and earnest earth-love will be still more purified and perfected in eternity.

Ronald was the first to speak. He raised her face from his bosom, and looked into the dewy light of her eyes as if he would read her very soul—and so he did.

"My own, my very own!" he said. "Incapable of change—so faithful and so true to a man of ruined fortunes—"

"But spotless name," she answered, proudly. "And oh, Ronald! life is too short to cherish, even for a moment, your plan of exile to create another fortune. Now, I am despotic; you shall not leave England! I will be a little—only a little longer I shall be privileged to prove my love, as few women can, by giving you back, as it were, the fortune which no forethought of yours could have preserved."

"Then I, Cecil; a man to be obliged to a woman—"

Cecil placed her hand on his lips.

"There is no man or woman in the case," she said; "it is simply love for love. Long ago, when you were rich, and I had nothing but a few paltry pounds, and there was reason to believe that poor Gerald, so handsome and distinguished as he was, a born, a man of fashion and fortune, coupled and followed by women whose adulation was sufficient to turn a stronger brain, would love me—indeed, and that other born would have claimed Middleton Lea; it was then you distinguished your Cecil from among women more beautiful, more accomplished. It was then you gave her your heart, it was then you offered her your hand—"

"And," interrupted Ronald Chester, "it was then that your brother's cruel selfishness interfered to prevent our union. You were necessary to his comfort—and he blighted our every existence. He treated me with insolence, because my father's wealth had been earned and our estates was not ancestral—he scoffed—"

"Peace, peace," murmured Cecil. "Time and his present state must tide over such memories. I shall never be all your own, though not even the richness of that blessing can stifle the desire that he may be spared a little longer, and not pass into the darkness unrepentant. I cannot generate nature. I weary Heaven with prayers that his heart may soften. Oh! you don't know the terror of the most awful night-mare. When he sends the nurse away and—but I must not stain with sorrow the few moments that are our own. What was I saying? Ronald, so happy!"

"My own! I am torn between my desire to be with you more than ever now, when the spring threatens to be full of storms, your youth is past, and my aching want is to win back in another country what I have lost in this."

"Oh, hush!" again interrupted Cecil, "who would put aside this commonwealth of love, who would live and compel me to live, in solitude, our hearts severed by love deferred!"

"Cecil!" exclaimed her lover, "if you had not married me when we first told each other of our love—"

"Let the past be past," she said. "Let us think, after darkness is gone, of the sunshine that must be ours."

I would not, if I could, chronicle the murmured and passionate words that still more sanctified their meeting. The disbelief in change, abiding, and unselfish attachment is one of the bad signs of our time. There are many, well stricken in the conventionalities of love à la mode, who hold in worldly contempt, even if they do not openly deride, the pure oneness in spirit and in truth which renders life to those who are devoted each to the other alike, amidst storm and sunshine, an unbroken and absolute joy. Such love is utterly incapable of change, and preserves the richly-dowered hearts in all the greenery of youth, even when their brows are crowned by the snows of age.

Their happiness was broken in upon by South, who announced, "Mrs. Graves, ma'am, wants you the restless fit is on him worse than ever; he calls for you, miss, and the nurse. I think you must let me run for Dr. Lacy."

"The drops, South," said Cecil.

"He threw the bottle at me when I mentioned them—I'll not go near him, ma'am. If you will go up, miss, I will find the doctor."

"You must not leave Miss Middleton alone, South," said Mr. Chester. "Tell me the doctor's address. I will send him."

CHAPTER III.

AND so they parted. She to listen to reproach and abuse—every word she uttered in her patient tenderness but adding fuel to the flame, until apother paroxysm of that fearful cough kindled by rage, and he, and he sank upon his cushions helpless and speechless. After such outbreaks he was silent from exhaustion. At last, with a shuddering his head beckoned her to him with his long lean finger. She knelt by his side, bending to catch his words.

"Were you out?"

"No."

"Some one below, then?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

She had never told an untruth to him or to any one else in her life. Her cheek flushed and he saw it.

"Chester," he cried, between his strong white teeth, "that fellow has been here to come here! To take stock, I suppose. But by—"

And he swore an oath that made Cecil tremble.

"You shall not have me with a deceiver, there is yet time—time to punish you both. Turn that lying hound, South, out of the room. Shut the door as you go. Sir; no remonstrance but it with a bang, Sir, like the sound of a cannon!"

Strengthened by his purpose he managed to raise himself.

"Give me some wine, give me some brandy, give me any thing for half an hour's strength. I told you to send away that fellow, and Scotch now festering within that desk; you have sworn to do it, and you are truth itself; you are the only Middleton that ever possessed it. Wine, wine, Cecil!" She poured some into a tumbler. "Fill it, fill it!"

He snatched it from her trembling hand, gulped it down, and cast the glass from him.

"Now, I will not spare you. You shall live, as I have lived, with the sword above your head; but it will be sharper, sharper to you than to me! Destroy not one of these papers. It is my injunction. Not One! Search, search, search, and enjoy, you and that ledger-man, enjoy what you will discover! I'm glad, glad, I did not destroy what I—" The last sentence came thickly and faintly from his lips, he signed for more wine, and having drank it the weak but long wasted limbs off the sofa. He seemed to desire to stand, and Cecil tried to help him. "Keep back!" he muttered, and a fearful change passed over his face, and he laughed hideously. "I should like to see you, and him, when the dread of this night's work, and that you think I've done, and so bad, Cecil; but keep the secret, Cecil, until after your marriage, or you would lose your beggarly portion. Ha! ha! you have not found out that, Cecil, need rejoicing, gilding! Now, unless you want me to curse you where you stand, promise me that you will not read, every line, every line you find! Promise!"

"I do," she said.

"A truce, a truce, a treat to dash down the cup of happiness, when it is brimming full! What, doctor!" he continued, as the physician entered. "Oh, I am better. I have played off a joke, a joke, by Jove!" At that instant the bells of a neighboring church commenced their weekly evening practice.

"The bells of Middleton Lea!" he exclaimed, and his head fell forward. "The bells, the bells ringing for my coming of age!" They lifted him back on the sofa, he gasped out a few wandering words, and—but few: his head had strayed back to his childhood, and he spoke as if to his mother, lovingly as a child would, and asked her to kiss him.

Gerald Middleton fell asleep that night to wake no more in this world.

CHAPTER IV.

THE last ceremony was over. Major Middleton had left his property, his estates, and his property with no gifts, no legacies, and Cecil Middleton was an undisputed heiress. Having locked herself into her own room she was seated with her brother's desk open before her; she had deferred opening it, day after day; she had gone through and arranged all other papers with her "man of business;" all was clear and straightforward. But an undefined dread took hold of her when, ever she looked at the desk, it was locked, clasped and studded with iron. She had parted with Ronald Chester in the drawing-room: only until the evening, when he was to return to dine with her and her lawyer, who was an old family friend. She would get through those papers before dinner, when she was to see no more of them.

Poor Cecil! Often her cheek flushed and her hand trembled; there were delicate notes, which a man of honor would have destroyed, locks of hair of all tints; trinkets; some Indian, but more frequently French, miniatures; every thing she touched, and she trembled under the protection of Major Middleton; all the world had heard of that, and Cecil remembered when the fair frail woman had been her schoolmate and child friend. There were letters containing passionate protestations of love; on the back of one her brother had sketched the inanimate face in her every active spirit of caricature.

His mother's letters and hers, addressed when he was abroad, were clasped together and placed in a separate drawer, quite away from the contamination of the other contents of his desk. She thanked him for the packet, and kissed the heavy tears, fell on the records of his mother's love. She had hoped that her task was ended, a few partly-colored embers were all that remained of what had once been warm and fresh and crushed. All gone except that last pure and precious packet. She murmured at the words of gratitude, and could not help wondering again and again, why at the last he had set her such a task, sufficiently painful without a doubt, and yet! was there any thing else? She tried, and retried every part of the inside drawer, hoped there must be something more, and at last, at the back of a small drawer, she saw a tiny steel knob; she pressed upon it, and a false panel sank within was a roll of paper or papers, tied together with a bit of twine, and something—a flat packet—found with the newspaper cut and folded and twisted. Cecil unfolded it, and saw a large case covered with soiled white velvet. It was difficult to open the fastening, so stiff was moisture (for such it was) was laid on its face, it had endured rough usage, the gold was battered as if it had been crushed on the pavement by a heavy foot. When Cecil lifted it, the shattered glass that once had protected the delicate painting fell on the table; it was the portrait of a boy in the lineaments of two persons, one evidently her brother, the other a dark woman, in young but imperial beauty; her dress was of the richest stuffs in her, left hung lightly over his shoulder, and the thick ring of marriage and its brilliant keeper circling the left hand of the original of that hand seemed to say, "Look at this, I am a wedded wife."

Cecil was spell-bound; her gaze was fastened on the little brown left hand. Was that woman already her brother's wife? Cecil's head fell on her clasped hands, and but for her labored breathing one would have thought she had fainted. And then she remembered the expression she glanced furtively at the picture, blurred and blotted as it was. There were Gerald's full brow, his large dark eyes, his handsome, his implacable mouth, his fair hair. Something had been written on the glass. Cecil laid the broken piece over the ivory: the writing had been scrawled across the woman's face; it was still legible—two cruel words were there—"Curse her!"

Sick at heart, Cecil undid the twine and outspread the roll. It contained a few letters of recent date, written in a woman's cramped hand, with a pen like a pin. Mechanically she read the first; it was expressed as though the writer had thought in a foreign language, and translated her thoughts into English. It commenced with my "Idol husband," and ended with your "floating wife."

"Wife!" How was it possible? She scrutinized the dats of that letter. He had been that year in Germany—at Spa she believed—and had invariably written to her from there until, but his London physician had laughed when she said so, and observed, "He thought the major was in the Highlands." She remembered that now.

Her brother married?

What a chaos the bare thought produced! What a revolution! Ronald! her dear Ronald master of Middleton Tea! Gerald married!

A little longer search with trembling fingers. A marriage certificate! Marriage solemnized between Mabel Elizabeth Le Roy and Edward Gerald Middleton, in Scotland, the place near Dunkeld, the name of the clergyman, all clear enough, and a witness—Charles Dacre.

"Charles Dacre!" Her brother, Cecil knew, had had a groom or some servant of that name a long time ago; but past and present were so mingled in her bewildered brain that she lost all power of distinguishing one from the other. She clasped her hands over her eyes to shut out—what?

Ay, what, indeed!

Gradually she sank from her seat upon her knees; her hands still folded over her eyes; her lips moved by earnest prayer, silent yet eloquent, in entreaty to Him who hears our thoughts! Her appeal was not in vain. She had been well practiced in self-control, but she did not rely on self; she called humbly to HIM to help her, and help came.

Calmed and strengthened, she arose and commenced, first turning over and then steadily reading the letters. She read the certificate over again. There was no envelope or direction among the papers, nor had the writer once named him—he was always addressed as "My own darling," "My heart's idol," or with some such expression of endearment, even if reproaches as to absence or neglect followed the first line. At all events Charles Dacre and he—pre-ent at the marriage.

Gerald had evidently parted from her in anger, and accused her of want of truth, of duplicity, of extravagance; told her how necessary it was that his marriage should be kept secret, it was so important to his prospects that it should not be known; and the vain, frivolous, stormy beauty had still the noble love to assure him that she would be torn in pieces by wild horses sooner than betray their secret until he gave her permission to do so.

Cecil felt herself shivering at her brother's falsehood; there was no reason connected with his prospects why his marriage should have been secret; and this beautiful woman, warmed into life and love by the temperature of a tropical sky, when quite a child (for she spoke of her sixteenth birthday), had become his wife and his victim. She read on. Under other circumstances she would have cast the letters aside as the ravings of an undisciplined, passion-full girl; but they possessed a fascination she could not withstand. She held the last in her hand; the writing was straggling and incoherent—it told of the birth of a child—his boy!

Why had he been angry? Had any one maligned her to him? her, his faithful, loving wife—"Little Brown Bess," as he had often called her, the mother of his child? Why should he write cruel words now? And the boy was so like him—such a beauty!

Cecil laid down the letter, which had been torn across. She was quite calm now.

If this were true, if her brother had left a son, all her prospects had been made into thin air and vanished. She was no longer an heiress; she no longer had the power of restoring her beloved to his position; her dream of life was over. This knowledge did not come to her in mist; it was first the cloud the size of a man's hand, increasing and increasing until it grew into a black wall between her and her husband's triumphs for ever more. Gerald's wife—Gerald's son—what had the poor thing done that he should have scarred her beautiful face with his curse? And the child—where was it? The facts were clear before her, but the details, the proofs (were there proofs?), were all confused. One dreary fact seemed to press on her heart and brain. Chester —Chester—to whom she had promised wealth and happiness! Sob after sob burst from her heaving breast, until her agony sought relief in words, and she repeated again and again, "Oh, my love! my love! my love!"

She gradually replaced the papers in their concealment, locked the desk, and crept stealthily into the hall. Some undefined suggestion took possession of her mind that she had no right to be there.

She met South, who at once saw that some fresh sorrow had stricken his lady. Instead of passing on, Cecil paused, and said:

"South, do you remember my brother having a groom—pad-groom, I think—of the name of Dacre?"

The expression of South's genial, good-natured face changed at once.

"Oh, the blackguard!" he exclaimed; and in the next moment added, "I'm sure I beg your pardon, Miss Cecil; I should not have said that, though it was the truth that sprang out of me. I never could abide him. The master thought I was jealous of him, which the Heavens knows I was not—neither jealous of him nor what he got—hush-money for many a turn of the poor master's, who was always wild, as no one knows better than yourself, Miss Middleton; only in course a sister's the last to know the turns of her brother's wildness, barring a wife—"

"Do you know where Dacre is?"

"No, Miss, I can't say I do, though I have a guess. I believe the master gave him a power of money to go to America after they came home last time, and master in such a terrible temper from—well, he called it Germany—and Dacre went; but the ship foundered at sea, and all perished."

"Of course my brother, Major Middleton, knew that?"

"Yes, Miss; I told him when I saw it in the paper."

"What did he say?"

"'Ring the bells, South'—never a word more."

Sick and broken-hearted, Cecil entered her own room. On the table was a bouquet of her favorite flowers that Chester had placed in the hand he so warmly kissed that morning.

She drew his miniature from her bosom, and, falling on her knees, pressed it between her clasped hands, murmuring:

"Help—oh help me, my Heavenly Father! Look with pity and mercy on me, while you strengthen me to perform my duty! Father, make me strong for justice!" And then, opening her hands and gazing through the mist of tears on the beloved face which for years had been her heart-companion, her comforter, her joy, she kissed it tenderly, murmuring: "My love! my love! my love!"

"Oh, my love! my love!"

She could not think of or count the time; but at last she heard the bell of her little clock chime four. In another hour she must meet Ronald Chester and her lawyer. The evening was closing in, and she was seated in the drawing-room, when they entered.

Ronald's footsteps, so light and buoyant, struck on her heart. She arose to meet him, but she could not advance, and was glad of an excuse to withdraw her hand from his affectionate clasp and give it to Mr. Cathcart. The strong sympathy which existed between Cecil and her betrothed made him feel, rather than see, that she had sustained a severe shock. The pressure of the beloved hand is more eloquent than words.

"What is it, Cecil? You are not well?" he whispered, tenderly, as he sought to penetrate the twilight and read her looks.

"By-and-by I will tell you," she murmured "after dinner. I am so glad Mr. Cathcart is here."

Mr. Cathcart was a thorough man of the world, and well knew the best way of dispersing a difficulty. He saw that something was wrong, but asked no questions, and talked incessantly. Cecil could not meet Ronald's eyes. He had left her so full of joyous life in the morning; they had walked up and down the drawing-room planning the happy future, upon which no cloud rested; and now she could hardly frame a sentence!

She rose as soon as dinner was ended, and said, "I will wait for you in the library."

Ronald opened the door, and followed her into the hall.

"My own Cecil, what is it?" he whispered, tenderly.

"There are some papers you and Mr. Cathcart must see to immediately."

Lovingly he took her sweet face between his hands, and saw that her eyes were brimming over with tears.

"My darling, what is it?"

"A little matter, Ronald. I will be ready for you in half an hour."

He circled her with his arm and supported her into the library. The lamp was lighted, and cast a strong light on the ebony writing-desk, which looked hideously black and stern. Ronald would have persuaded her to have a business until the next day, she looked so unwell, but she would not. "Leave me," she said, "for half an hour, and then—both of you come to me!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MATCH GAME—MATRIMONY.

One very busy day Johnny was sent to school to be out of the way. At night he came home, and jumped astride of his mother's knee, and said:

"Ma, what did you do to-day without no pud-dle and Johnny to make it fun?"

"I missed you, his mother said.

"Ha! you'll find out how much worth I am in this house."

"Ducks" are expensive. A lady recently bought three—a "duck" of a dress, a "duck" of a bonnet, and a "duck" of a parasol. The combined cost was $236.

A bachelor sea-captain, who was remarking one day that he wanted a good cook, was promptly informed by a young lady present that she had no objections to be his first-mate. He took the hint—and the lady.

A father, living near Cincinnati, was one evening teaching his little boy to recite the multiplication lesson. It was from the fourteenth chapter of Matthew, wherein is related the parable of a malicious individual who went about sowing tares.

"What is a tare?" asked the anxious parent. "Tell me, my son, what a tare is?"

"You bet 'em."

"Johnny, what do you mean?" asked the astonished parent, opening his eyes rather wide.

"Last week, when you didn't come home for three days," said Johnny, "I heard another bill under Sarah that you were on a tare."

The Sunday-school lesson was brought to an abrupt close, and Johnny was sent off to bed.

Some young ladies feeling aggravated by the severity with which their friends speculated on their gay dress, necklaces, rings, etc., went to their pastor to learn his opinion.

"Can you think," said they, "there is any impropriety in wearing these things?"

"By no means," was the prompt reply: "when the heart is full of vain and ridiculous notions, it is well enough to hang out the sign."

A new church was being built in the vicinity where little Milton H—— lived. The work went on very slowly; and sometimes stopped for days. At last Milton's patience was exhausted. "I do wish," he exclaimed, "they would get that church." "Ah!" said his grandmother, "don't be in too big a hurry. The world wasn't made in one day." "I know it wasn't," Milton replied; "but when the Lord commenced to make it he never stopped until he finished it."

A LITTLE DEAR.

She spread the goods before him
With half-averted eyes,
The quality and value
Extolling to the skies.

That voice—oh, how bewitching!
Those hands—how soft and white!
Those eyes—how fascinating!
That face—how fair a sight!

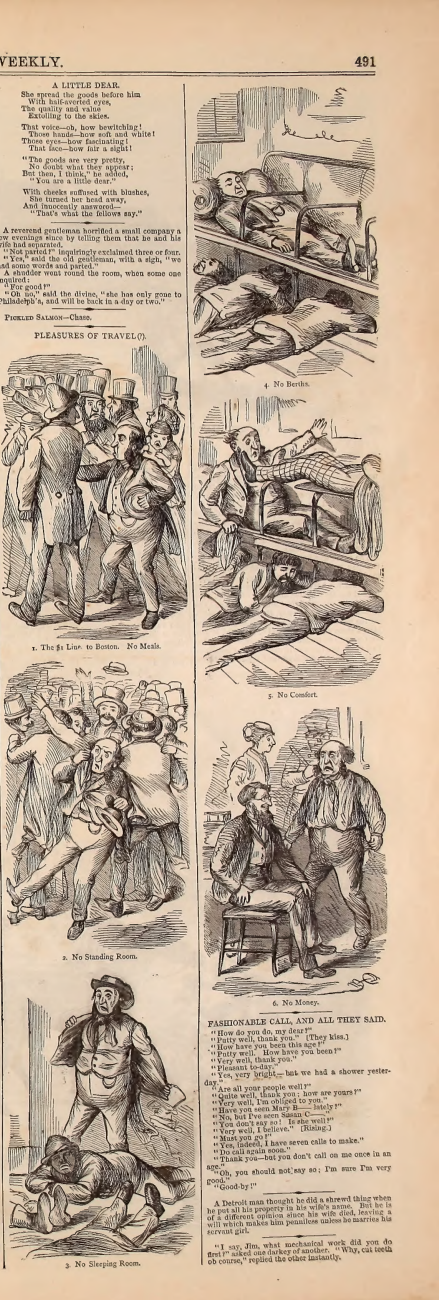
"The goods are very pretty,
No doubt what they appear;
But then, I think," he added,
"You are a little dear."

With cheeks suffused with blushes,
She turned her head away,
And innocently answered—
"That's what the fellows say."

A reverend gentleman horrified a small company a few evenings since by telling them that he and his wife had separated.

"Not parted?" inquiringly exclaimed three or four.

"Yes," said the old gentleman, with a sigh, "we had some words and parted."



A shudder went round the room, when some one inquired:

"For good?"

"Oh no," said the divine, "she has only gone to Philadelphia, and will be back in a day or two."

PICKLED SALMON—Chase.

PLEASURES OF TRAVEL(?).

FASHIONABLE CALL, AND ALL THEY SAID.

"How do you do, my dear?"

"Putty well, thank you." [They kiss.]

"How have you been this week?"

"Putty well. How have you been?"

"Very well, thank you."

"Pleasant to-day."

"Yes, very bright—but we had a shower yesterday."

"Are all your people well?"

"Quite well, thank you; how are they?"

"Very well. I'm obliged to you."

"Have you seen Mary B—— lately?"

"No, but I've seen Susan C——."

"You don't say so! Is she well?"

"Very well, I believe." [Gliding.]

"Must you go?"

"Yes, indeed, I have seven calls to make."

"Do call again soon."

"Thank you—but you don't call on me once in an age."

"Oh, you should not say so; I'm sure I'm very good."

"Good-by!"

A Detroit man thought he did a shrewd thing when he put all his property in his wife's name. But he is of a different opinion since his wife died, having a will which makes him penniless unless he marries his servant girl.

"I say, Jim, what mechanical work did you do first?" asked one darkey of another. "Why, cat teeth ob course," replied the other instantly.

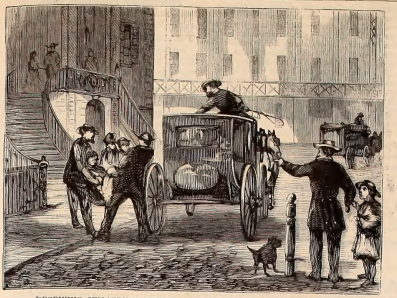
CRICKET MATCH BETWEEN THE ST. GEORGE'S AND KNICKERBOCKER CLUBS.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE CRICKETERS.

THE field-sportsmen are in the field in great numbers this year, and thus far several interesting base-ball and cricket matches have taken place. We illustrate on this page the game of cricket played on July 15 and 16 by the St. George's Club, of this city, and a deputation of the Philadelphia clubs, against the Knickerbockers, of Montreal, composed of officers of the military garrison of Montreal—a fine set of men, physically and otherwise.

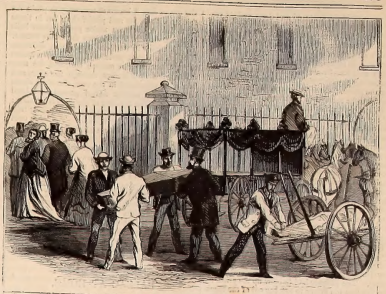
The game was begun on July 15, and the St. George's men and their Philadelphia associates made 160 runs on the first inning. The Canadians did not have such good fortune, and were bowled out after having made but 72 points. By the rules of the game the Canadians retained the bat—at which, by-the-way, they greatly excel—for the second inning, and made 91 points. This placed them only three ahead of the total of the St. George's on their first inning; after the latter had taken the bat the bowler of the Canadians made three "byes" and a "wide," probably intentionally, thus giving the game to the St. George's Club.

The cricketers of the country are making arrangements for a vigorous season, and the game is growing in favor daily. Among the anticipated sensations is the arrival here of the All-England Eleven—an event in cricketing circles which the St. George's Club has been active in endeavoring to secure. It is hoped that this Club will be induced to come here as the guests of the St. George's in September or October next, and, if so, they will probably make a tour of the principal Eastern cities and visit Canada.



THE SEVRES PORCELAIN WORKS.

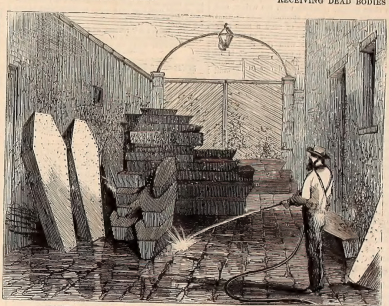
HER biographers have not generally given Madame de Pompadour, the famous favorite of Louis XV., the credit due her for her inventive genius. She was not only a patron of literature and art, but an inventor, and had something of the merchant in her mental organization. It was she who invented the "dumb-waiters" in such general use in these days. When Louis XV. had tired of the plays which she got up for his enjoyment Madame Pompadour invented the famous petits soupés of Choisy, where, in a dainty room hung round with the canvases of Boucher, Greuze, Watteau, Vanloo, the king supped with a dozen chosen guests in luxurious privacy. No servant entered the room, even to bring in the viands. A note was laid on a console in a corner of the room; a bell was sounded, silently the table descended, and as silently returned bearing on it, as was ordered, the rarest dishes, fruits, wines, in vessels of plate, or glass, or Sèvres. We are accustomed to these "lifts," as we call them—vulgarizing the name as well as the thing—but when the Pompadour invented them they were regarded as a stroke of genius, and their execution a triumph of Lorios's art.



The most remarkable of her artistic plans was the foundation of the famous porcelain works at Sèvres. Sèvres was almost entirely her creation. For the factory she set apart a palace, provided with beautiful gardens, fountains, canals, and whatever could add to the charm of the place or the pleasure of the workmen, for whom she procured various immunities and privileges, including the much-prized liberty of hunting in the forest as well as the petite chasse. The manufacture itself she watched over with the greatest interest, frequently visiting the works, suggesting new objects and new designs, sometimes furnishing designs herself, or making alterations in those laid before her, or proposing new combinations of color. Choice works were executed at her desire, and painted by eminent artists, in order to present to the king or some favorite prince or minister, or to adorn her own apartments. To purchase costly articles from the Sèvres works was a successful mode of winning her favor, and she soon had the happiness to find the taste for Sèvres, especially her own favorite pâte tendre, become a rage. The true old Sèvres is perhaps as good an illustration of her artistic taste as can be found. Elegant, brilliant, luxurious, you have in it the genuine Art Pompadour, as it was designated by French critics, the art that has colored every subsequent species of French design, and, with some little difference of style, is the prevalent Parisian art of to-day.

AT THE SEA-SIDE.—[DRAWN BY THOMAS WORTH.]

RECEIVING SUN-STRUCK INVALIDS AT BELLEVUE HOSPITAL, NEW YORK.

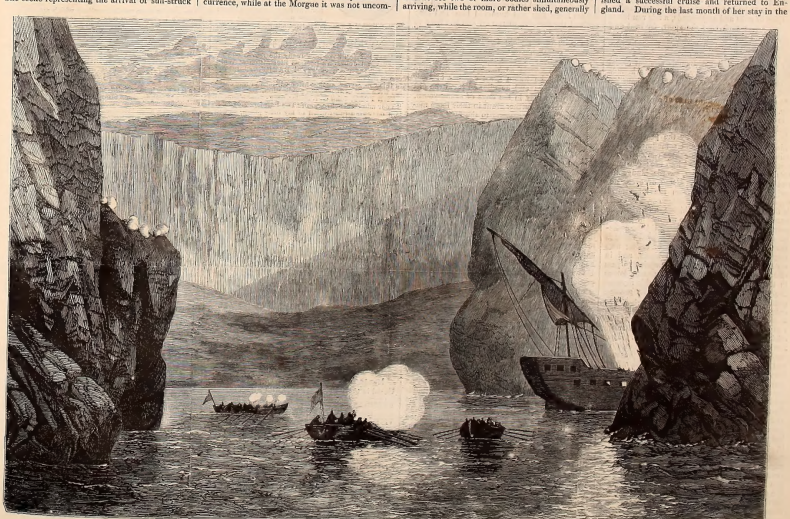


RECEIVING DEAD BODIES AT THE MORGUE, NEW YORK.

THE TORRID TERM.

THERE were 246 deaths from the immediate effects of the heat during the "torrid term" of this year—from July 12 to July 18, inclusive—six days. That is at the rate of four for every hour of sunshine—forty-one a day—one every thirty minutes! But even these returns do not include the deaths in the public institutions, such as the hospitals, nurseries, and alms-houses, unreported to the coroner. The heat of mid-summer, and the mortality resulting from it this year, have exceeded that of any year since 1824.

The result of the "torrid term" has been to drive every body to the country or the Morgue. The rush to the country has been unusually great, and the city has been, as it were, depopulated. And yet daily the rush seems as great as ever. Trains and steamers leave the city crowded to excess with men and women and children of all conditions of life, all eager to fly from the heated city. Our illustration on page 489 is not in the least exaggerated. Our artist has sketched an actual scene, to be daily witnessed at any of the metropolitan railway depôts.



Another artist has painted, on this page, the other side of the picture. He has given us there the story of those who could not flee—except by way of the Morgue. During the "heated term" named, the New York Morgue, at the foot of Twenty-sixth Street, and the various hospitals, have been crowded to painful excess. Our illustrations of Bellevue Hospital and the Morgue are actual reproductions of what our artist saw on visiting those places during the heated term. The scene representing the arrival of sun-struck patients at Bellevue Hospital was of painful recurrence, while at the Morgue it was not uncommon to see two or more bodies simultaneously arriving, while the room, or rather shed, generally devoted to the reception of bodies upon which inquests are to be held by the Coroner, was so overcrowded that large numbers of coffined bodies had to be deposited temporarily in the yard in front of the Morgue, where "Dead John," the keeper, or one of his assistants, was kept constantly employed in endeavoring, with hose and water, to keep them cool. The signs of decomposition are very easily discernible, and after a short time the coffins emit not alone disagreeable odors, but that fog peculiar to putrescent humanity, and a dozen such coffins present the appearance of a lime-kiln in full blast." The Morgue is one of the necessary disgraces of the city, and while the Commissioners of Public Charities and Correction are to be commended for the establishment of the institution, they are to be seriously and emphatically condemned for the manner in which it is conducted. This horror of the city is made unnecessarily horrible by the rudeness and carelessness of the employés, the filth and dirt at all times observable, and the absence of any means, such as vaults, etc., to preserve the dead in decency. The Morgue is an institution which needs constant inspection.

COFFINED BODIES AT THE MORGUE WAITING FOR THE CORONER.

THE ARABIAN SLAVE-TRADERS.

THE pursuit of the Arabian slavers who infest the Gulf of Arabia has of late been attended with considerable success, and it is reasonable to hope that the traffic may eventually be suppressed. The British sloop of war Spiteful has lately finished a successful cruise and returned to England. During the last month of her stay in the

BLOWING UP AN ARABIAN SLAVE DHOW BY THE CREW OF THE BRITISH SLOOP OF WAR "SPITEFUL."

Arabian Gulf she captured and destroyed six vessels employed in the slave-trade, and rescued two hundred men, women, and children from slavery. One of her officers has furnished an illustration, which we give, of one of the most exciting of her cruises. It represents the blowing up of a very large and heavily-armed slave dhow, which, on perceiving the Spitfire, had immediately run in for the shore. On arriving at the place she was found to be secured in a narrow creek, between lofty cliffs, of which the numerous fighting men of the dhow had taken possession, while the remainder of her crew were seen hurrying the slaves away to the mountains. The principal officers of the Spitfire, manned and armed, were sent away at once to destroy the slaver, which they did by blowing her up, under a heavy fire from the denizens on the cliff, who held their position very placidly in spite of a rapid and accurate fire from the ship and boats. Some five slaves were found hidden in the dhow, from whom it was ascertained that above 350 slaves had been landed from the vessel. On the destruction of the dhow her crew fled into the interior. The prize-crew of another dhow, taken a few days before by the pinnace, were attacked by her former crew, and another mountain Arab tribe, who kept up a heavy fire of musketry on her from the shore, but happily without much effect. The pinnace had to blow up the prize, as the fire was too heavy to tow her out of the creek where she was attacked. Two of the dhows destroyed were armed with 6-pounder carronades, for which they had a good stock of ammunition.

WOLF-HUNTING IN FRANCE.

An undergraduate of Dublin, being called on to enumerate the most regretable events in Irish history, considered his list with the fact of the termination of the last wolf in 1710. No brute in Europe is better adapted than the wolf for being run to death, and more difficult to overcome than a better apology for hunting. A bear hunt is most frequently a duel or an assassination. The stag, the hare, and even the wild boar, are inoffensive when unmolested; the fox and the badger are too small to be personally dangerous, but the wolf is at once a foe to be respected for his teeth, a brigand accountable for a life of rapine, and a test of strength and metal for the hunter. Shy by the term dogs most, however, he understood the ordinary pack, for the greyhound is not able to attain the wolf at first sight, and in such case he invariably mars the sport. In the Auba a couple or two of greyhounds sometimes accompany the meute for the hare and wolf hunting; the consequence is that most frequently, when the game takes the open country, the hounds follow the wolf out of sight, and either seize it at once, or so impede its pace as to enable the pack to arrive and finish the bloody work. In some cases the chances of an exciting run are further diminished by the submission of rifles, and it too often happens that a solitary wolf, by a ruse of the nasty, will lead in the cover before the dogs give tongue, leaving the huntsman to disperse for lack of game, or to go in for foxes. Still, occasionally, in spite of guns and greyhounds, a fair run takes place, and in such case the sport, for heat and spirit, is all the most ardent huntsman can desire; the wolf bursts unexpectedly from the cover, and straining for some distant point in possible another department, bounds straight away through all kinds of country, and leads the hounds a chase which often ends in their exhaustion and discomfiture. The wolf is far from being the object of a royal hunt than of a popular battue. His destruction is sought by persons whose sole aim is to kill him, and the means are rarely likely to fail are those adopted for the purpose; his retreat is surrounded by the peasants and villagers of the locality, and sometimes by the united populations of two or three cantons. All sorts of weapons are called into use—guns and muskets, horse-pistols, bayonets, swords, bludgeons, and above all, pitchforks. Dogs of every description join the hum, from the huge Pyrenean watch-dog to the common village cur. A circle is then formed round the thicket, and when the nature of the ground and the number of persons permit, the ring tightens gradually till the assistants are able to join hands. A second circle is then formed outside, composed of such as are suspended across the runs and issues, and in order to scare the wolf from attempting to pass elsewhere, the men hang by their caps and blouses in the intervening spaces. Up to this moment every thing is accomplished with the greatest precaution and the best noise possible, but no sooner are the arrangements complete than the dogs are let loose, and the men begin shouting and hallooing and thumping the foliage with their sticks. Presently the dogs grow furious. Their instinctive respect for the wolf becomes redoubled by the consciousness of his presence, and when excited from time to time with a heavy scent, they howl and gnash with a sort of frenzy. This excitement of the dogs soon gains the men, who, from mere noise and clamor, proceed gradually to yells and imprecations. They then set to, regularly abusing the wolf in terms, and the less disposed he shows himself to quit the cover, the more abundant are the terms of reproach heaped upon him. The prevailing atmosphere is, "Bouge là, afreuse bête qui manges les moutons: Va donc, va donc, enfers, given in accents require rendering to be understood, such, for instance, as the following: "Show up and fight, you great bony cadger." "Come out and pay the dogs, you mangy thief." "Fire his tail, the carrion howler." The wolf meanwhile remains insensible to the abuse of his persecutors. A mortal fear detains him, and in spite of the terrific din around his lair, he lies close and immovable within a few yards of the enemy. At times, when the woods are too dry to permit of the use of fire, it becomes necessary to probe the thicket with sticks and pitchforks; but in times of moisture, the men make powder-paste balls and throw them lighted into the wolf's retreat. This method, if well employed, soon dislodges him. The intent posture of the dogs prepares the spectators for a sudden bolt, and the next instant the wolf dashes through the ring, and becoming entangled in the nets, the scene closes in confusion, amidst stifled groans and hard breathing. The dogs rush to their legs peculiar: the small ones howl strangely, hiding their tails and trembling with convulsions. The large ones appear transported with a kind of wild ecstasy, their jaws grind and chop, their eyes become wild and bloodshot, and their hair bristles on all their limbs. Meanwhile, the dogs have fairly killed the wolf they refuse to touch his dead body. Not so the men; these thump and fork the carcass as the fun becomes utterly worthless for the furier, and nothing remains in the way of profit but the small premium claimable at the Mairie. A cord is then attached to the poor animal's hind legs, by which he is trailed home in triumph, and the money received from the mayor, augmented by donations solicited from door to door, is spent in drunken revelry over his mutilated remains.

BALZAC AT HOME.

Balzac's own works, original and exceptional in their introspective power, lead the reader into close mental relations with the writer, and necessarily suggest inquiries as to what is the outer ways and habits of such a man may have been. His habit of beginning to work at midnight is in harmony with the impression which his writings make upon us. It is fit that his terrible investigations should be made in silence and secrecy, and that he should move to its dread office like the knife of a surgeon who deals with forbidden things dragged out of the tomb. This was the way he reasoned: he went to bed very early, and slept till midnight, when he rose to write down those painful revelations of human life, those monstrosities, and human folly which have fascinated mankind because they have laid bare the mysteries of an inner world hidden from us by our conventional glimpses, and exactly analyzed fitting thought and unrecognized passion. Balzac would sometimes be at bed to let the contemplations which accompanied his work that he would discover himself, to his own great surprise, at dawn in the woods of Versailles or on the Place du Carrousel in his dressing-gown and slippers, without his hat. The sudden passing from the agitation of composition, churning his thoughts by rapid movement. An unexpected highway man hanging of his cravat, or a gen'd'arme escaped from the asylum, would hardly have startled him more than this apparition of himself; and first he would endeavor to recover his composition, and then he would hastily climb on to the roof of a Versailles omnibus, and jog on steadily for a while, with the view of the Seine, gatfulness which was not wholly unaccountable, for he rarely had a penny in his pocket. This proceeding caused no astonishment to all the drivers knew him and humored him, and they suffered the account to run on and the debt to accumulate ad infinitum.

In spite of his plain features and strange, flovenly costume, Balzac was a favorite with Parisian ladies; there was something in exhibited them in his novels as vicious, frivolous, and cold-hearted, he was a great extoller of their personal beauty; and as he had a keen sense of beauty not only in the days of sunny youth, but gave them a further grant in their more mature years. His description of the most irresistible date the death of loveliness; and so the coquettish matron, full of days, poring over his pages, saw the hours of romance and excitement further than she had ventured to hope, and beheld an empire created for her more extended and more solid than her most sanguine dreams had ever dared to shape.

Whatever Balzac, however, and whatever their misdemeanors, Balzac had a great relish for their admiration, and a pretty woman's smile was worth all the literature of all the critics in his eyes—his eyes in that case governing his thoughts. But, though his success in that direction was very dear to his susceptibility, he exhibited on all sides—and though, as a novelist, he was the fashion—he had a personal grievance. He was not a dramatist; and the want of the great proportions of his contemporary Victor Hugo's genius, in the comprehensiveness of his grasp, in the fullness of his imagination, in the power and vastness of his conceptions, a power of such magnitude as seemed to redince his own to a concentrated point, in the combination of all the parts in a successful dramatist; and every play that he produced caused a strange fermentation and irritation in the mind of the writer. He saw each of these occasions, wondered and wondered, and struggled vainly after plots and situations. He was perplexed; there was nothing in a man as himself, who could see so deeply into the intricacies of human passion—into the most remote and winding ways of the human heart, should fail when he tried to write a play? He resented this deficiency, and could not find its explanation; yet, to say one thing of his novels, it is evident that their peculiar force depends upon qualities essentially opposed to those which are required for the construction of a drama. He makes his impressions by careful detail and elaborate description. His characters explain themselves by the help of minute circumstance. His story unfolds itself gradually, and in his satire his own presence is always felt. Every one of his works is stamped with the special image of his features, and his view of life is one-sided. The large forces of the enemy—the great human passions, the exaltation of the poetic mood, the concentration of plot, the construction of situations which at once reveal a character or unravel a train of events—all these things, which constitute the power of a play-writer, were wholly alien from the mind of Balzac. But he would not believe that any gift could be denied to him, and while the loud applause of Hugo's audacious rang in his ear he resolved that he too would be the author of a drama. And, so resolved, he forsaw, according to his wont, a mine of inexhaustible wealth as the necessary result of his determination.

Harper's Weekly, One Year..... 4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year..... 4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Harper's Periodicals will be delivered to City Subscribers without charge.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, in cloth Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $1 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postpaid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $5 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, prepaid yearly, at the office where delivery, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the Magazine, the Weekly, or the Bazar, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of the Publishers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

660 MILES
OF THE Union Pacific
RAILROAD

Are now finished and in active operation. One hundred and twenty miles have been built in the last three months. More than twenty thousand men are employed, and this average of forty miles per month will be continued throughout the season, making NINE HUNDRED COMPLETED MILES by January 1st, and it is now probable that the ENTIRE GRAND LINE TO THE PACIFIC WILL BE OPEN FOR BUSINESS IN 1869.

No other first-class railroad in the world has been built and equipped so rapidly as the Union Pacific, which runs west from Omaha

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

The United States Government makes of this railroad a GREAT NATIONAL WORK, and aids its construction by very liberal grants of money and of lands. To further insure the speedy completion of the Road, the Company are authorized to issue their own

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS,

having thirty years to run, and having interest coupons payable semi-annually at the rate of six per cent. in gold. The principal, as well as interest, is made

PAYABLE IN GOLD.

The Mortgage Bonds of nearly all other railroads in this country are payable principal and interest, in currency; and it is asserted, without fear of contradiction, that no other railroad company in the world, building on great soil extent of road, issues bonds of equal value with the First Mortgage Bonds now offered for sale by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The price of these Bonds is now 102 and accrued interest from July 1, in currency. The Company believe that at this price their Bonds are the

in the market, and they confidently expect that they will shortly command a higher premium than any similar security. The Company reserve the right to advance the price at any time, and will not fill any orders or receive any subscriptions on which the money is not paid in full at the Company's office before the time of such advance. Subscriptions will be received in New York

AT THE COMPANY'S OFFICE,
No. 20 NASSAU STREET,
and by JOHN J. CISCO & SON, BANKERS,
No. 59 WALL STREET.
And by the Company's advertised agents throughout the United States.

Remittances should be made in drafts or other funds per in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local agents, will look to them for their safe delivery.

A PAMPHLET and MAP FOR 1868 has just been published by the Company, giving fuller information than is possible in an advertisement, respecting the Progress of the Work, the Resources of the Country traversed by the Road, the Means for Construction, and the Value of the Bonds, which will be sent free on application at the Company's offices or to any of the advertised agents.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
JULY 2, 1868. New York.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S Patented PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its appearance is a semblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It will not change color, is the favorite of scientific men, and has not only called forth the encomiums of all in connection with it in practical properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the late Fair of the Institute. Watches are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in our own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent timekeepers. Price, from $16 to $38. Further details will be found in circulars, which will be sent to any one on demand.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

DISASTER follows NEGLECT.

Whoever feels the premonitory symptoms of sickness should remember that it adds the agony of self-reproach to the pangs of disease to remember that they might have been prevented.

Languor, debility, and low spirits are often the precursors of terrible disorders. They indicate an immediate necessity for a tonic, and the best tonic in existence is HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Sick headache, pain in the right side, and yellowness of the whites of the eyes, are unmistakable symptoms of an approaching bilious attack, and, in order to ward it off, common prudence dictates the propriety of resorting to the most efficacious of all anti-bilious preparations—

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Flatulence, nausea, oppression after eating, irregularity of the bowels, and a distaste for exertion, denote a disordered state of the stomach which, if neglected, is sure to culminate in chronic dyspepsia, but which may be relieved in a few hours, and entirely cured in a few days, by taking half a wineglassful of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS at regular intervals.

All physicians admit that innumerable lives are sacrificed every year that might have been saved by premeditated remedies. Remember that one of the principal uses of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS is to put the system in a condition to resist disease. It recruits and restores the exhausted strength, and is, therefore, especially needed during the season when intense heat makes such heavy and constant drafts on the vital principle.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.
THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as wore, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the finest materials, the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay exp. the express charges.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N.Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).
TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.
CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

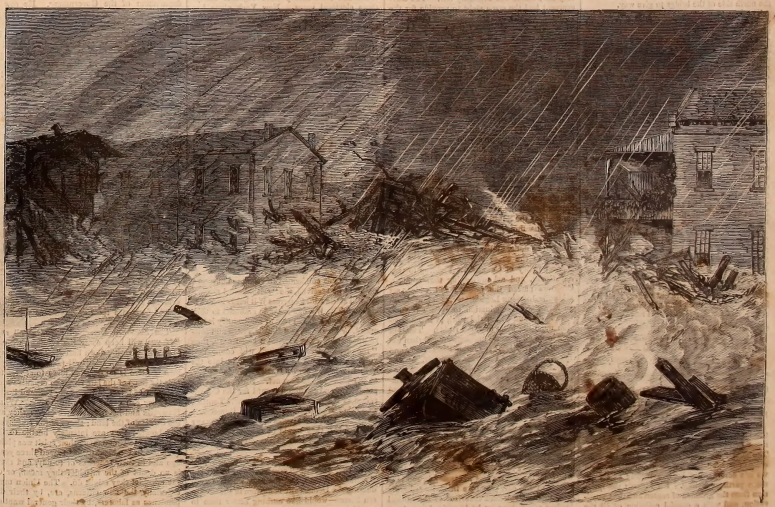
THE GREAT FLOOD IN MARYLAND—JAMES E. CARR RESCUING WOMEN AND CHILDREN.



THE GREAT FLOOD IN MARYLAND—DESTRUCTION OF THE LARRABEE IRON-FOUNDRY.

THE MARYLAND FLOOD.

THE sudden rise in the Patapsco, Lehigh, Jordan, and other streams of Maryland and Pennsylvania, which have their rise on the eastern slope of the Alleghany Mountains, has caused immense damage to property in various parts of the country, and sad and serious loss of life in Baltimore and Ellicott City. Our illustrations on this page and on page 500 were sketched on the spot by our artist, Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS, and may be relied upon as accurate and complete.

The reason of this sudden flooding of the streams has been attributed to the overflowing of a lake near Baltimore and various other equally unsatisfactory causes; but as simultaneous floods occurred at various places along the Atlantic slope of the Alleghanies, it is doubtless to be attributed wholly to the heavy fall of rain which began on the morning of July 24 and lasted until one o'clock of the same day. The singular part of the affair and the most difficult to explain is the rapidity with which the streams rose. The Patapsco River at Ellicott City and Jones's Falls, which runs through Baltimore city, rose at the rate of five feet in ten minutes! The water came down those streams like a great continuous wave on the sea-shore. The river at Ellicott City rose ten feet before a drop of rain had fallen there, and was at one time forty feet high! In Baltimore the rise was so rapid that a gentleman entering a clear atom in a dry street returned with his lighted cigar to find himself knee-deep in a rapidly rushing stream. A passenger car, while crossing a street, was caught by the flood which had just commenced to pour through it, and with its passengers swept for several blocks toward the river. The market-men were caught at their work, and only had time to get on their benches and stalls for safety, and these were washed away with their occupants. So rapid was this rise, and so wild and furious the rushing torrent, that the lives of many persons were jeopardized, and several were lost. Had it occurred at night, as in the great flood of 1837, the loss of life could not but have been immense. Cradles with their freight of infantile humanity were washed out of the houses and carried down stream. The streets were undermined, and in one instance a wagon-load of people—fifteen in number—were overflowed up in a hole, and soon found themselves struggling in water up to their waists. Bridges were carried away so suddenly that the sufferers could not get away. Most of the bridges connecting East and West Baltimore were totally destroyed.

Our illustrations will give an idea of the ravages of the flood at its greatest fury. One of our engravings represents an incident which is never likely to be forgotten, and will always reflect great credit on the brave citizens. The New Telegram describing the scene we illustrate, says:

"It is a true saying that in time of great public calamities some man rises to the position of a great public benefactor; and such was the case yesterday with Police Commissioner Augustus W. Cain. He at first apprehended the character of the calamity, and he immediately set to work to organize a sufficient force of policemen to manage them. He soon had work enough to do. He led the van to his boat in places of great peril, and rescued women and children from death. Two parties he rescued from Davis Street were in the second story of the house, hoisted out a child above their head, with the water to their necks and fast increasing. In his boat he took the children thrown in the water, but he continued setting an example to his men, for they all most willingly followed. At one time he was out in the flood alone, and the news swept throughout the city, causing profound regret and hope beyond, that he was lost. He was fortunately rescued to continue again until necessity ceased for his services. The scene would scarcely be awarded to the Police Commissioners and the police for the manner in which they labored."

Another illustration shows the destruction of the Lauraboe Iron-Works. A house to the north of it was first swept away, which gave to the falls at this point a new channel, and permitted the flood to mark the foundry for destruction. It is soon brought it down to the ground, and its lofty cupola now rests at an angle of sixty degrees.

A third illustration, on the first page, is of the destruction of the Fayette Street Bridge, Baltimore. Several persons were on the bridge above this street, and with an immense amount of accumulated drift-wood dashed with full fury against the bridge, it finally gave way for a long time, and suffice resisted the attacks of the waves; but at last, as if lifted by some mighty hands, the bridge tumbled into the river, with or without leaving a trace behind. The waters took the immense iron fragments as if they had been feathers, and, after toying with them for a while, threw them with great force upon Baltimore Street Bridge. This caused the north side of the bridge to give way.

The loss of life and property at Ellicott City was even greater than at Baltimore. Our illustration on page 501 is of the scene presented at the Patapsco Mills at the height of the flood. Near these mills—one of which was carried from its foundations, and the other materially damaged—were a row of large stone-houses. The occupants were frequently warned of the dangerous approaches of the freshet, but, trusting to their former experience, they chose to remain until a little longer, thinking there would be time to escape when the flood came. Within a few minutes the flood rose so rapidly that all communication was cut off, and the current rushed so swiftly that it was found impossible to render them any aid. At this time the water had only reached above the lower story of the houses, and no danger was apprehended if the occupants could reach the roofs. This they at once proceeded to do; but the water still rose higher and higher, and sped on its frightful course with immense velocity; and, to add to the terrors of the hour, huge masses of drift rubbish came rushing upon the doomed dwellings.

Every effort was made by the horrified citizens to rescue those who were in peril, and quite a number were saved, owing to the energetic work made by the flood in its fearful velocity. many perished within a dozen yards of the shore.

The whole of the lower part of the town was flooded, goods were washed out of stores into the streets, and standing on a dozen yards of shore in tangled heaps, with here and there trees, logs, stones, and the debris of houses and bridges.

CONCLUSION OF "HARPER'S HISTORY OF THE REBELLION."

THE concluding chapter of "Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion" contains a remarkably candid and admirable statement of the political situation since the war. The writer begins by acknowledging the difficulty of satisfactorily describing events in which we are actors; but he is evidently free from mere partisan feeling. He regards the question from the grounds of reason and the Constitution, and with a careful collation of all the facts, and his conclusions are therefore of very great value. They are not the less agreeable to us because they vindicate the general wisdom and necessity of the Congressional policy of restoration, while the writer distinctly shows the fatal blunder of the President's policy. He has little confidence in what he calls the "spleadid theories" of Mr. SUMNER and Mr. STEVENS. The necessary measures of reconstruction, he thinks, were evident from the first, excepting the general suffrage. That became an evident necessity at a later period. But if the principle of the Fourteenth Amendment had been accepted by the rebel States, reorganization might have been effected long before. He is rather disposed, therefore, to blame the tardy action of Congress in this matter, so that he furnishes good reasons for the delay.

One of the most vital and controlling elements of the case was the unconquerable spirit of the late rebels, and that could be determined only by experience. As the result has shown, it would have been a disastrous mistake to assume that acquiescence in emancipation, renunciation of the rebel debt and of the right of secession, would alone have been sufficient to insure the security for which the Government was bound by every consideration to provide. The doubtful and reluctant, even protesting manner in which the Johnson Legislatures agreed to these obvious conditions, and the short time which they immediately passed to nullify them, with the testimony of the most candid observers, and the general experience of mankind, revealed the delicate and difficult task which presented with which the country had to deal. The utmost deliberation was essential, not only for the preservation of public tranquillity, prosperity, and the education of the popular perception that the measures were judicious. The President, with the Democratic party, and the disaffected population of the conquered States, evidently hoped to rifle to the action of Congress. They constantly threw upon Congress the responsibility of delaying reconstruction, and perpetuating a state of war. They asserted to the country that Congress was solely to blame for the oppressive taxation by refusing to receive loyal representatives. They declared that Mr. JOHNSON'S policy was a continuation of Mr. LINCOLN'S, and that "a Central Directory," a despotic committee of the House, had usurped all the power of the Government and paralyzed the action.

Against so insidious and plausible an assault Congress could only hope to oppose the facts of the situation, and they could only gradually be disclosed. The Fourteenth Amendment was therefore slowly matured. It required the civil equality of all citizens; the renunciation of the rebel debt; the repudiation of secession; and the disfranchisement of certain leaders, and without controlling the State regulation of suffrage, provided that no rebel State should gain political power by rebellion. This became the basis of representation in case of arbitrary exclusion by reason of color. This was not only perfectly fair, but the only fair. Government had the same right to provide for the national security by such conditions that it had to abolish slavery during the war. As the masterly report of the Reconstruction Committee on presenting the amendment declared, if all the political rights of rebellious States are left absolutely under the control of their governments rebellion is inevitable upon any political defeat, and the Government has no protection whatever.

This amendment was a test of the situation. If frankly accepted, reconstruction would rapidly proceed; if rejected, other measures or total reconstruction were imposed. The amendment was further, and this has not been sufficiently remarked, a final effort to harmonize the Executive and Congress. For if it were ratified it would be by the Legislatures of the States independent and assembled. It was, however, contemptuously rejected, and the alternative was proposed that the country should wait for reconstruction upon the basis of equal rights. This will was in no other sense unconstitutional than every reconstruction upon the President's, and the Emancipation Proclamation itself. The object of the war was to conquer peace, and after the war there remained the no less difficult work of securing the peace which had been conquered. Was the security of the conquest any less important than the conquest itself?

This is the general view which is presented with ample detail, and, as we think, with generally sound reasoning, in this admirable chapter. Our exceptions to the writer's view would be, as we have already indicated, that the delay which he deprecates was necessary in the very nature of the case; and we think he is hardly just to the "splendid theories" of the radical leaders which have, as he himself shows, been vindicated. They were theories founded in very just views of human nature and of historical experience, and the policy deprived from them was conclusively defended by the same argument which the writer so justly employs in support of the military bill. This chapter does evidently been prepared with great care and conscience; and we can honestly say the same of the other political and military chapters of this copious and richly illustrated chronicle of the war. It presents a full gallery of portraits of all the conspicuous soldiers, sailors, and civilians; a comprehensive and valuable series of maps and plans; with accurate and most interesting illustrations of all the famous scenes, objects, and battles of the war. We can not hesitate to recommend it as the most desirable contemporary illustrated history of the rebellion which has appeared, or is likely to appear.

"THE PHYSICAL FORCE" PROGRAMME.

THE Democratic party enters upon the campaign with all the reckless braggadocio of BLAIR'S letter. It already threatens "physical force," and evidently hopes to carry the election by noisy bullying. It has tried that game, however, once before, in 1860, under more favorable circumstances, and its success was not very encouraging. Emboldened, however, by the signs of a reaction in the elections of the last autumn, it now announces that it will come of the ballot-box regulating the control of votes in the Presidential election. The New York World, feebly emulating the tone of MR. BLAIR, its candidate for the Vice-Presidency, says:

"It is proper that the usurping demagogues in the Federal Capitol should be warned in time against proceeding to make good their threat that forbearance would cease to be a virtue. The actual majority of the citizens of the United States must have a fair opportunity to decide who shall govern the country. If the will of the majority is defeated by political knavery, they will have power (being a majority) to redress the wrong; and Congress mistakes the temper of American freemen if it supposes they will not use it when the will. If we are fairly beaten after an honest election, we understand and shall practice the proper virtue of a minority—submission. But we shall not tamely submit to be cheated. If the Republican party administers the Government at the next four years, it must be in virtue of an actual majority, not a fictitious majority manufactured by political conspiracy. The physical power of the country resides with the conservative majority; and as the Constitution has provided no other mode for deciding on the claim of electoral votes to be counted, it concerns the peace of the country that Congress do not interfere to prevent the voice of the actual majority from deciding who shall be President."

Now the actual majority of the voters do not decide a Presidential election. If one hundred and fifty-nine electors are necessary to a choice, they may have received in each State in which they were chosen only one hundred majority, and the minority majorities ranging from two to a hundred thousand. Pennsylvania and New Jersey have together thirty-three electoral votes. New York alone has thirty-three. The electoral vote of New York may be determined by fifty majority, but in opposition it must require a host of Pennsylvania and New Jersey combined, which may be determined by fifty thousand majority. It is not the actual majority of citizens that decides: it is the majority of the electors chosen in the States who elect the President.

The World says that the Republican majority must not be defeated by proscription and exclusion. This, if it is any thing more than bombastic nonsense, means that certain excrebels are proscribed and certain States excluded; and it assumes that if the vote of any person now disabled in the State of South Carolina shall be refused, or a vote assuming that the State of Mississippi, if Mississippi has not complied with the law, shall not be received, the "arithmetical majority" will "redress the wrong"—in other words, revolt in order to "redress the wrong" that there is no tribunal but the "arithmetical majority" to decide the claim of electoral votes to be counted.

Of course as Congress, in pursuance of the general principle of reconstruction, has decided that the vote of Texas and of Mississippi, if they have not conformed to certain conditions, shall not be counted, the "arithmetical majority" will settle with Congress if it holds to its decision. The World's bravado amounts to this, that if the vote of the rest of the country is hallowed, or nearly so, and that if Texas and Mississippi would elect SEYMOUR and BLAIR, then "the arithmetical majority" will count that result. Then SEYMOUR and BLAIR into the White House, as WADE HAMPTON recommends, at the point of the bayonet. And such is the patriotism and profound regard for the Constitution, of WADE HAMPTON and ROBERT TOOMBS, and other similar devotees of the Democratic party, that if those votes would elect GRANT and COLFAX they would of course insist upon marshaling them also in the same manner to the Executive mansion.

The Southern Democratic leaders—WADE HAMPTON, ROBERT TOOMBS, HOWELL COBB, RAPHAEL SEMMES, and the rest, who are conducting the Democratic campaign in the Southern States—would like nothing better than to see the country again in arms. They have nothing to lose by it, and revenge is sweet.

THE DEBT AND ITS AUTHORS.

THE Democratic papers and orators are very fond of emphasizing the fact that the United States have a great debt, and that the people are heavily taxed. They declare that when the Democratic party controlled the Government the public expenses were infinitely smaller and the taxes were practically imperceptible.

Very well; granting that the debt is large and that the taxes are heavy, why do they not denounce and not laud as they have so? For the same reason that the criminal prefers not to plead guilty. The debt is large and the taxes are heavy because the Democratic party, when it was constitutionally removed from power, rose in rebellion at the South, remained as a party hostile at the North, and compelled the Government to incur enormously for its existence. An enormous war makes an enormous debt. Those who caused the war create the debt. Who began the war? Was it JEFFERSON DAVIS, WADE HAMPTON, ROBERT TOOMBS, RAPHAEL SEMMES, and the other Southern Democratic leaders who fired upon Fort Sumter, or was it Major ANDERSON who defended it? If the people had submitted to the control of those Democratic patriots and conservative friends of the Constitution there would have been no debt and no taxation to-day except for pensions. The rebellion was plotted in a Democratic Cabinet and Senate. The debt is the price of the salvation of the country from the rebellion of Democrats. If the Democratic party succeeded in the constitutional result of an election in which they took part there would have been no war, no debt, and increased taxation. The debt is a Democratic debt, and the taxes are sharp hints of a foiled conspiracy of Democrats against the Government.

And what is the remedy for this increased taxation which the Democratic platform proposes? Swindling. First the Democratic leaders rebel, and then from our purses, and then the honor from our name. As we have incurred a material victory in the war, they are trying to prepare for us a moral defeat in refusing to pay the expenses of the war. And this is why, for the purpose of those whose haughty hearts still swell in the hatred of the Union, and who disdain the Government when they do not control it, is to be submitted in the words of HORACE GREELEY OF GORMAN, to "the calm, quiet, thoughtful common-sense of the people." Does MR. O'GORMAN say, why does not a man in this country long enough to understand something of the common-sense and of its conclusions, doubt what its verdict will be upon a proposition of national infamy? Does he suppose that the people whom the rebels could not conquer they can dishonor?

MR. O'GORMAN came from a country in which a part of the population was oppressed. He landed in a country where a part of the population was enslaved. He saw that slavery paralyzed in every kind of sophistry and interest and prejudice. He saw it in possession of every department of the Government. He saw it haughty, defiant, desperate. He saw it apparently intrenched a thousand times more securely than the oppression of England in his own country, an oppression against which he had ventured his life in the name and hope of Irish liberty. He saw that the sin seen that slavery triply mailed pierced to the heart by "the calm, quiet, thoughtful common-sense of the people." Joined to the slave lords, who were now defeated rebels, appealed to that and equal Government, MR. O'GORMAN is busily engaged in the work of trying to resuscitate the corpse of an infamous tyranny. He appeals to "the calm, quiet, thoughtful common-sense of the people."

That common-sense has already doomed him and his confederates to the scorn and the enemies of the national life and the national honor, the common-sense that baffled their attempt at secession will defeat their effort at repudiation and revolution.

THE RECESS OF CONGRESS.

THAT the cry of a running pickpocket should be "Stop thief!" is not surprising, but that the party whose candidates for Vice-President and whose most conspicuous orators call for a reversal of Reconstruction Acts by the sword, should denounce their opponents as preparing for civil war.

The Southern Democratic leaders all say, "Let us have our own way the safest way we can manage the voting down here." That is to say, that the KU-KLUX KLAN will take care of loyal men if there is no national force to appeal to. It is the hope of the late rebels to organize such a system of terror in the newly restored States that they can easily control the vote. WADE HAMPTON and his friends have said as they are the owners of the land; they are the employers of laborers; they are intensely hostile to the Union and to Union men; their spirit was plainly shown in the black-codes passed three years ago and in their speeches of to-day, and there is no doubt of the mischief they mean, or of the mischief they might do. The Union men, especially the new citizens, are, by their dependence as laborers, by their general want of land, by their long habit of subserviency, and by being unarmed, peculiarly at the mercy of men like HAMPTON, TOOMBS, COBB, and the other Democratic chiefs.

The Governors of the restored States, apprehending trouble, would, under the Constitution, call upon the President for aid. But they know that they would call in vain. The President has declared that he does not acknowledge them, and his sympathies are known to be with the disaffected class. Congress, therefore, considers what should be done to protect loyal citizens from the KU-KLUX Klan and a conniving Executive, and thereupon the party organs, which delight in CRAIN'S letter, which consider TOOMBS and HAMPTON eminent defenders of the Constitution, and contemplate their purposes against loyal citizens with perfect equanimity, cry out that Congress is preparing civil war. When HORATIO SEYMOUR can persuade the American people that he was as patriotic as GRANT, then the late rebel Governors may hope to convince the country that it is GRANT and his friends, and not they who wish for civil disturbance.

Congress is under the most solemn obligation to take care that the loyal men of the Southern States, and especially the new citizens, are protected in voting. It is not excusable for dealing with the subject except according to its knowledge of the situation. It is necessarily not bound to deliver loyal men into the hands of their bitter enemies because the President will help them. In the present excited state of feeling in the disturbed States, a feeling unspeakably inflamed by the declaration of the Democratic purpose of overthrowing the whole work of reconstruction, the abnormal situation must be constantly remembered. With a President in harmony with Congress there would be no apprehension. But with the present dull and dogged Executive the utmost must be assumed. The experience of three years should have taught all loyal men, who with General GRANT desire peace upon a secure foundation, that the President can no more be trusted than CHARLES I. He must be always suspected and watched. It would, therefore, have been an inexcusable mistake if Congress had insisted upon adjourning until December. It has done wisely in taking a recess. Undoubtedly, within two months or less after the recess, the President will take some surprising step intended for mischief. Indeed, as we contemplate the official career of this man, whom the truest Union men did not wish to nominate for Vice-President four years ago, there is profound satisfaction in reflecting upon the character and career of SCHUYLER COLFAX, who, taught by terrible experience, the same men have now nominated for the same position with all its possibilities. GRANT'S quiet tenacity is like LINCOLN'S; and COLFAX will carry out the principles of his party when GRANT betrays his flag.

DROUGHT IN PARTS OF EUROPE.

A DROUGHT unparalleled since 1798 was, at our latest dates by steamer, prevailing in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and of a character so general and severe as to cause very gloomy apprehensions. In parts of France, Spain, and Germany the want of sufficient rain is complained of, but it had not reached the proportions of a serious drought. The want of rain is attributed to the prevalence of easterly rather than of equatorial influences, by which the atmosphere of a rainless region has been distributed over England for a period of unusual duration. Whatever may be the cause, the effects are production, and the wants which may be supplied by food from more fortunate regions, will no doubt be correspondingly felt. The wheat harvest of England is being gathered in better order, so it is stated, than usual; but there is a great falling off in the crop of oats, barley, and hay, and, what is also important, the root crops, except what was planted early, and the pastures are nearly dried up. Its first effects upon our market were shown in the considerable demand a few weeks ago for cheese and lard, and in the advance in the price of Indian corn. The supposed extensive crop of wheat harvested and being harvested in England has prevented any rise there in the price of wheat; but wheat must very slowly upon their local markets, and it will doubtless be found that the grain is very much shrunk. Our wheat is obtained by the English at all seasons for the purpose of being mixed with theirs, as by the union better bread is the result. Whatever may be the extent of their crop of wheat an unusual amount will be required to supply the loss of other crops.

The quantity of land depastured in a country so diversified with hill and dale as England is greater than the quantity under plow, and, when the pasturage fails, whatever crop may be in excess of the usual production is called upon to supply this want, and that, also, of the crops which suffer from the same cause. "National, in the longest sense" (says the Economist, in a late Number), "nothing, it is said, betters but the wheat crop, and though the saying is exaggerated the essence is true: Give us cheap bread for man, and the price of food for other animals matters but very little." To this it may be safely answered, that when the other harvests all fail cheap bread is an impossibility.

A drought is one of the most serious of calamities that can be visited upon a people; and although only about three-tenths of the English population are agriculturists, and the full amount of articles of food produced there fills far short of the total consumed, yet it will be found that the effects of the drought—the English not being accustomed to it—are not accurately understood by those who hope that it may be compensated for in an unusual wheat crop.

STRABO remarks of the climate of England "that the sun generally shines only for a few hours, and that in the morning and evening it is hid in clouds or fogs." The freshness and peculiar luster which vegetation almost universally exhibits except in winter, are due not so much to heavy as to drizzling rains, and to frequent dews and fogs; but this season the English can boast of the brightness of an Italian sky. As the matter possesses unusual interest, we select some statements from our English files to show the duration and extent of this visitation.

Wales.—"The farmers in the Welsh valleys are suffering severely, there being nothing for cattle to eat. The grass is literally burned up, and on being felt by the hand crumbles into dust just like dried herbs. To make matters more severe, there is not a single drop of water directly dry at early morn as at noonday. The farmers on the hill-sides are still worse off, as the springs are fast drying up for all purposes, the springs and small streams in many places being completely dried up. The farmers are driving the cattle on to the mountains, which are usually the most moist."

The Moors.—"On one moor it is said more than half of the young birds are gone for want of water, none surviving but those hatched near springs or brooks. Many sheep have died upon the high ground and not see a single grouse. In my opinion there will not be more than one-third brace killed to one gun per diem. Crops of all kinds are gone here. I do not know what is to be done for want of fodder."

The Trial of the Leicester agricultural show on the 13th July, of which a report in full is observed, "The leading feature of the day has been the immense number of broken shares, and the general nervousness there is likely to be on the ground. Passing from one field to another the visitor has come upon numberless heaps of disabled iron-work, and it has not been difficult to discover the cause of the mischief."

"Many wheat fields in this district (Newcastle) are now literally swarming with insects which threaten the complete destruction both ear and size, which have located themselves in close proximity to the grain. Several large fields in the vicinity of Walker present a very unfavorable appearance, and from a distance the mass of insects imparting a dark tint to the summit of every stem, and the ground occasioned by their troublesome presence is likely to inflict heavy loss upon the farmers. It is one of the most destructive species of the Aphis."

"The harvesting time on this farm (the Prince Consort's model farm) at Windsor this year is considered to be six weeks earlier than the average of seasons." Wheat heavy and in fine condition; beans and oats cut and above the average. The London Express of the 6th says:

"The long-continued drought is becoming a matter of serious import to the farmer. The traveler by railway, through any part of England, reads the same story in every direction. The fields should be green and fresh have an arid and rusty look; as if their vegetation were artificial, and had grown shabby in the confusion; beans and oats cut and bald and brown, while the grass of parks and pleasure grounds is dry and withered as straw. If it had been singed. London is suffering too. Our sewers are becoming abominably offensive, and our streets have, over and above the general closeness and stuffiness of July, a fetor of foul flavors. The taints and odors are spreading from the sewers, and are above our handsomest and most spacious thoroughfares, and are insinuating themselves into their native homes as well. Night after night does the sky give promises which the morning belies. The sparse pellets of the last week have done little more than sharpen the edge of the evil. When will the rain come? is still on our lips."

The Daily News of the 7th say:

"The want of rain is beginning to be seriously spoken of in Ireland. In consequence of the continued drought the hay harvest is extremely light. Though of the best quality, the produce per acre of milk and butter is necessarily curtailed owing to the dizzery which cattle endure from want of sufficient moisture."

The Freeman's Journal says:

"Since the summer of 1826 such a season has not been known. We say this on the authority of what was only equaled in its genial character by April and May, in which we had nearly all sunshine and no showers."

The Mark Lane Express of the 12th inst. collects together reports from all parts of England, which confirm what we have thus presented. We give some specimens of these reports:

From Lincolnshire.—"Intense heat continues. In many cases it is damaging the wheat, and as for barley it is now past recovery, and is drying prematurely, to become, without doubt, bad in quality and in quantity. Pastures can never recover under any circumstances, so that fat meat after a few weeks must be scarce and dear, and the chance of a turnip crop is hopeless."

Warwickshire.—"The root crops in this district are generally very poor, and in many instances have failed to come up at entirely lost."

Suffolk.—"The drought continues, parching up every thing green and rendering the country most dreary."

From the east coast of Scotland.—"We are still without rain so much needed by spring corn and root crops."

A correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle, in England, writes that he was then at an elevation which commanded a view of the country for thirty miles in extent, and that the hedges and trees which send their roots deep into the earth were alone green, and that the pastures were universally suffering. "The popular delusion" (he adds) "that grass is green will soon be among the forgotten fallacies of the past."

The Manchester Guardian, of the 13th ult., says: "Rain has fallen on only three out of the last 104 days in the Manchester water-shed, and the fall on those occasions was so small that it was entirely absorbed into the ground and the reservoirs received none."

Advices by telegraph state that the drought was broken about the 24th of July.

The fact that the existence of a drought "in the interior provinces of the north of Spain," and in parts of Germany and France is also spoken of, shows its extension upon the Continent, but in a much less severe form than that prevailing in England and Ireland.

In England the price of meat had fallen, because both cattle and sheep had been slaughtered in excess of what was usual owing to the want of hay, and of pasturage; but when meat had fallen but little, as the crop had reached the market much earlier than usual, although not in large quantities.

The question whence the supply will be obtained to make up this unfortunate deficiency is one of great interest. The crop of wheat in California promises this year to average millions of bushels, such is the estimate; and as freights are low at San Francisco for outward bound vessels, competition from that quarter may be expected. In many parts of Europe the crop of grain promises to be full, and in the United States a wheat harvest unprecedented in quantity is now being gathered. The law of distribution, by which the deficiency in one country is supplied from the excess in others, will be put in full operation to the advantage of the United States as one of the countries upon which the favors of Providence, in respect to what is gathered and what is promised, have been bountifully bestowed.

"REGULAR AND PEACEFUL."

MR. HENRY C. MURPHY, now State Senator from the Brooklyn district, was chairman of the committee upon resolutions of the late Democratic Convention, and is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor. Indeed, at the late Democratic meeting in Brooklyn, over which he presided, MR. MURPHY was introduced by name as candidate at the next Governor of the State, which was, at least, premature. In his speech upon taking the chair MR. MURPHY said that the Democratic party was pledged to a reversal, by regular and peaceful means, of the Congressional policy of restoration. Undoubtedly MR. MURPHY wishes that this were true, and undoubtedly he would regladly have the country believe that the Democratic party was pledged to this and nothing more. But he has not stated the case exactly. MR. MURPHY has forgotten what the country very well remembers.

The facts are that the Democratic Convention, before it adjourned, by a unanimous suggestion, that "the Reconstruction acts (so-called) of Congress, as such, are usurpations, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," proceeded with enthusiasm to nominate General BLAIR for Vice-President, who had just stated, in the most unequivocal manner, his remedy for these "usurpations," and these "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void" acts of Congress. We do not find that MR. MURPHY in his speech mentioned General BLAIR'S plan. It is this:

"There is a way," says the Democratic candidate for Vice-President, "to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President and his cabinet these acts null and void, compel the army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State Governments, allow the white people to reorganize their governments, and elect Senators and Representatives." So said General BLAIR just as the Convention met. That athletic combination of the most restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances; and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling under dust the usurpations of Congress, known as the Reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the Convention upon this issue.

Undoubtedly he did, and upon that issue he was nominated; and in nominating him the Convention pledged the Democratic party to his plan. Is that plan, as stated by himself, supported by WADE HAMPTON, by FORREST, by HOKE, by all the Democratic delegates who believe with HAMPTON that the rebellion is not a lost cause if SEYMOUR can be elected, a "reversal by regular and peaceful means?" Just as much as JEFF DAVIS'S request to be let alone is a request to abandon secession, just as much as WADE HAMPTON'S demand upon his party that if the KU-KLUX Klan can succeed in doing as it pleases at the South SEYMOUR and BLAIR shall be placed in the White House, "in spite of all the bayonets that shall be brought against them." This may be what MR. MURPHY calls peace and regularity; and MR. PHAEL SEMMES agrees with him. But we doubt if the country does.

ANOTHER CERTIFICATE FOR MR. SEYMOUR.

JACK FALSTAFF swore that he made himself hoarse with hallooing of anthems in his youth. MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR'S "friends" swear that there was no such Union patriot as he during the war, and they are bringing forward all kinds of certificates to prove it. But MR. SEYMOUR will be accepted as a loyal Union man when Jack Falstaff passes for a saint—and not before. We add the following to the list of certificates:

MR. THURLOW WEED, a pretty good "Conservative" authority, in a letter written in September, 1865, says: "In 1862 Governor SEYMOUR, urged by Judge STRYKER and other loyal Democrats (as Hamlet urged his mother) to abandon a vicious, made a patriotic speech in Brooklyn, and was elected Governor. In the days of disaster which followed, MR. LINCOLN, finding Governor SEYMOUR'S power for usefulness, and his political only of his party's welfare, charged me to say to Governor SEYMOUR that if he would use his position and power to crush the rebellion, a grateful people would reward him with the Presidency. I gave the message of an enlightened and patriotic President to a metaphysically-muddled Governor, whose Secessionist and Copperhead proclivities and associations brought deserved reproach and destruction upon himself and his party."

A STALE SLANDER UPON MR. COLFAX.

LAST year, when the Democratic papers circulated the infamous falsehood that MR. COLFAX had written "Sixteen Reasons" why General GRANT should not be nominated, we published a note from the Speaker which effectually disposed of that libel. As the poison is now again showing itself, and with increased virulence, we again apply the antidote.

SIXTH NARRATIVE.

Contributed by Sergeant Cuff.

DORKING, Surrey, July 30, 1849.—To Frank-lin Blake, Esq. Sir,—I beg to apologize for the delay that has occurred in the production of the Report with which I engaged to furnish you. I have waited to make it a complete Report; and I have been met, here and there, by obstacles which it was only possible to remove by some little expenditure of patience and time.

The object which I proposed to myself has now, I hope, been attained. You will find, in these pages, answers to the greater part—if not all—of the questions, concerning the late Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, which occurred to your mind when I last had the honor of seeing you.

I propose to tell you—in the first place—what is known of the manner in which your cousin met his death; appending to the statement such inferences and conclusions as we are justified (according to my opinion) in drawing from the facts.

I shall then endeavor—in the second place—to put you in possession of such discoveries as I have made, respecting the proceedings of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, before, during, and after the time, when you and he met as guests at the late Lady Verinder's country house.

II.

As to your cousin's death, then, first.

It appears to me to be established, beyond any reasonable doubt, that he was killed (while he was asleep, or immediately on his waking) by being smothered with a pillow from his bed—that the persons guilty of murdering him are the three Indians—and that the object contemplated (and achieved) by the crime, was to obtain possession of the diamond, called The Moonstone.

The facts from which this conclusion is drawn, are derived partly from an examination of the room at the tavern; and partly from the evidence obtained at the Coroner's Inquest.

On forcing the door of the room the deceased gentleman was discovered, dead, with the pillow of the bed over his face. The medical man who examined him, being informed of this circumstance, considered the post-mortem appearances as being perfectly compatible with murder by smothering—that is to say, with murder committed by some person, or persons, pressing the pillow over the nose and mouth of the deceased, until death resulted from congestion of the lungs.

Next, as to the motive for the crime.

A small box, with a sealed paper torn off from it (the paper containing an inscription) was found open, and empty, on a table in the room. Mr. Luker has himself personally identified the box, the seal, and the inscription. He has declared that the box did actually contain the diamond, called the Moonstone; and he has admitted having given the box (thus sealed up) to Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite (then concealed under a disguise), on the afternoon of the twenty-sixth of June last. The fair inference from all this is, that the stealing of the Moonstone was the motive of the crime.

Next, as to the manner in which the crime was committed.

On examination of the room (which is only seven feet high), a trap-door in the ceiling, leading out on the roof of the house, was discovered open. The short ladder, used for obtaining access to the trap-door (and kept under the bed), was found placed at the opening, so as to enable any person, or persons, in the room, to leave it again easily. In the trap-door itself was found a square aperture cut in the wood, apparently with some exceedingly sharp instrument, just behind the bolt which fastened the door on the inner side. In this way any person from the outside could have drawn back the bolt, and opened the door, and have dropped (or have been noiselessly lowered by an accomplice) into the room—its height, as already observed, being only seven feet. Any active person, or persons, must have got admission in this way, appears evident from the fact of the aperture being there. As to the manner in which he (or they) obtained access to the roof of the tavern, it is to be remarked that the third house, lower down in the street, was in the course of repair—that a long ladder was left by the workmen, leading from the pavement to the top of the house—and that, on returning to their work, on the morning of the 27th, the men found the plank which they had tied to the ladder, to prevent any one from using it in their absence, removed, and lying on the ground. As to the possibility of ascending by this ladder, passing over the roofs of the houses, passing back, and descending again, unobserved—it is discovered, on the evidence of the night-patrol, that he only passes through Shore Lane twice in an hour when out on his beat. The testimony of the inhabitants also declares that Shore Lane, after midnight, is one of the quietest and loneliest streets in London. Here again, therefore, it seems fair to infer that—with ordinary caution and presence of mind—any man, or men, might have ascended by the ladder, and might have descended again, unobserved. Once on the roof of the tavern, it has been proved, by experiment, that a man might cut through the trap-door while lying down on it, and that in such a position the parapet in front of the house would conceal him from the view of any one passing in the street.

Lastly, as to the person, or persons, by whom the crime was committed.

It is known that the Indians had an interest in possessing themselves of the Diamond. (2) It is at least probable that the man looking like an Indian, whom Octavius Guy saw at the window of the cab speaking to the man dressed like a mechanic, was one of the three Hindoo conspirators. (3) It is certain that this same man dressed like a mechanic, was seen keeping Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite in view all through the evening of the 26th, and was found in the bedroom (before Mr. Ablewhite was shown into it) under circumstances which lead to the suspicion that he was examining the room. (4) A morsel of torn gold thread was picked up in the bedroom, which persons expert in such matters declare to be of Indian manufacture, and to be a species of gold thread not known in England. (5) On the morning of the 27th, three men, answering to the description of the three Indians, were observed in Lower Thames Street, were traced to the Tower Wharf, and were seen to leave London by the steamer bound for Rotterdam.

"NEVER MORE WERE THEY TO LOOK ON EACH OTHER'S FACES."

There is here moral, if not legal, evidence that the murder was committed by the Indians.

Whether the man personating a mechanic was, or was not, an accomplice in the crime, it is impossible to say. That he could have committed the murder alone seems beyond the limits of probability. Acting by himself, he could hardly have smothered Mr. Ablewhite—who was the taller and the stronger man of the two—without a struggle taking place, or a cry being heard. A servant girl, sleeping in the next room, heard nothing. The landlord, sleeping in the room below, heard nothing. The whole evidence points to the inference that more than one man was concerned in this crime—and the circumstances, I repeat, morally justify the conclusion that the Indians committed it.

I have only to add that the verdict at the Coroner's Inquest was Willful Murder against some person, or persons, unknown. Mr. Ablewhite's family have offered a reward, and no effort has been left untried to discover the guilty persons. The man dressed like a mechanic has eluded all inquiries. The Indians have been traced. As to the prospect of ultimately capturing these last, I shall have a word to say to you on that head when I reach the end of the present Report.

In the mean while, having now written all that is needful on the subject of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's death, I may pass next to the narrative of his proceedings before, during, and after the time when you and he met at the late Lady Verinder's house.

III.

With regard to the subject now in hand, I may state, at the outset, that Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's life had two sides to it.

The side turned up to the public view presented the spectacle of a gentleman, possessed of considerable reputation as a speaker at charitable meetings, and endowed with administrative abilities, which he placed at the disposal of various Benevolent Societies, mostly of the female sort. The side kept hidden from the general notice exhibited this same gentleman in the totally different character of a man of pleasure, with a villa in the suburbs which was not taken in his own name, and with a lady in the villa who was not taken in his own name either.

My investigations in this villa have shown me several fine pictures and statues; furniture tastefully selected and admirably made; and a conservatory of the rarest flowers, the match of which it would not be easy to find in all London. My investigation of the lady has resulted in the discovery of jewels which are worthy to take rank with the flowers, and of carriages and horses which have (deservedly) produced a sensation in the Park among persons well qualified to judge of the build of the one and the breed of the others.

All this is, so far, common enough. The villa and the lady are such familiar objects in London life that I ought to apologize for introducing them to notice. But what is not common and not familiar (in my experience) is that all these fine things were not only ordered but paid for. The pictures, the statues, the flowers, the jewels, the carriages, and the horses—inquiry proved, to my indescribable astonishment, that not a sixpence of debt was owing on any of them. As to the villa, it had been bought, out and out, and settled on the lady.

I might have tried to find the right reading of this riddle, and tried in vain—but for Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's death, which caused an inquiry to be made into the state of his affairs.

The inquiry elicited these facts:

That Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite was intrusted with the care of a sum of twenty thousand pounds—as one of two Trustees for a young gentleman, who was still a minor in the year eighteen hundred and forty-eight. That the Trust was to lapse, and that the young gentleman was to receive the twenty thousand pounds on the day when he came of age, in the month of February, eighteen hundred and fifty. That, pending the arrival of this period, an income of six hundred pounds was to be paid to him by his two Trustees, half yearly—at Christmas and at Midsummer-Day. That this income was regularly paid by the active Trustee, Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. That the twenty thousand pounds (from which the income was supposed to be derived) had, every farthing of it, been sold out of the Funds, at different periods, ending with the end of the year eighteen hundred and forty-seven. That the power of attorney, authorizing the bankers to sell out the stock, and the transfers written orders telling them what amounts to sell out, were formally signed by both the Trustees. That the signature of the second Trustee (a retired army officer, living in the country) was a signature forged, in every case, by the active Trustee—otherwise Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

In these facts lies the explanation of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's conduct in paying the debts incurred for the lady and the villa—and (as you will presently see) of more besides.

We may now advance to the date of Miss Verinder's birthday (in the year eighteen hundred and forty-eight)—the twenty-first of June.

On the day before Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite arrived at his father's house, and asked (as I know from Mr. Ablewhite, senior, himself) for a loan of three hundred pounds. Mark the sum; and remember at the same time that the half-yearly payment to the young gentleman was due on the twenty-fourth of the month. Also, that the whole of the young gentleman's fortune had been spent by his Trustee by the end of the year forty-seven.

Mr. Ablewhite, senior, refused to lend his son a farthing.

The next day Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite rode over, with you, to Lady Verinder's house. A few hours afterward Mr. Godfrey (as you yourself have told me) made a proposal of marriage to Miss Verinder. Here he saw his way, no doubt—if accepted—to the end of all his money anxieties, present and future. But, as events actually turned out, what happened? Miss Verinder refused him.

On the night of the birthday, therefore, Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's pecuniary position was this: He had three hundred pounds to find on the twenty-fourth of the month; and twenty thousand pounds to find in February, eighteen hundred and fifty. Failing to raise these sums, at these times, he was a ruined man.

Under those circumstances, what takes place next?

You exasperate Mr. Candy, the doctor, on the sore subject of his profession, and he plays you a practical joke, in return, with a dose of laudanum. He trusts the administration of the dose (prepared in a little vial) to Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, who has himself confessed the share he had in the matter, under circumstances which shall presently be related to you. Mr. Godfrey is all the readier to enter into the conspiracy, having himself suffered from your sharp tongue, in the course of the evening. He joins Betteredge in encouraging you to drink a little brandy-and-water before you go to bed. He privately drops the dose of laudanum into your cold grog. And you drink the mixture.

Let us now shift the scene, if you please, to Mr. Luker's house at Lambeth. And allow me to remark, by way of preface, that Mr. Bruff and I, together, have found a means of forcing the money-lender to make a clean breast of it. We have carefully sifted the statement he has addressed to us; and here it is at your service.

IV.

Late on the evening of Friday, the twenty-third of June (forty-eight), Mr. Luker was surprised by a visit from Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. He was more than surprised when Mr. Godfrey produced the Moonstone. No such diamond (according to Mr. Luker's experience) was in the possession of any private person in Europe.

Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite had two modest proposals to make in relation to this magnificent gem. First, would Mr. Luker be so good as to buy it? Secondly, Would Mr. Luker (in default of seeing his way to the purchase) undertake to sell it on commission, and to raise a sum down, on the anticipated result?

Mr. Luker tested the Diamond, weighed the Diamond, and estimated the value of the Diamond, before he answered a word. His estimate (allowing for the flaw in the stone) was thirty thousand pounds.

Having reached that result Mr. Luker opened his lips, and put a question: "How did you come by this?" Only six words! But what volumes of meaning in them!

Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite began a story. Mr. Luker opened his lips again, and only said three words, this time. "That won't do."

Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite began another story. Mr. Luker wasted no more words on him. He got up and rang the bell for the servant to show the gentleman out.

Upon this compulsion, Mr. Godfrey made an effort, and came out with a very different version of the affair, to the following effect.

After privately slipping the laudanum into your brandy-and-water, he wished you good-night, and went into his own room. It was the next room to yours, and the two had a door of communication between them. On entering his own room Mr. Godfrey (as he supposed) closed this door. His money-troubles kept him awake. He sat, in his dressing-gown and slippers, for nearly an hour, thinking over his position. Just as he was preparing to get into bed, he heard you talking to yourself in your own room, and going to the door of communication, found that he had not shut it as he supposed.

He looked into your room to see what was the matter. He discovered you with the candle in your hand, and leaving your bedroom door. He heard you say to yourself, in a voice quite unlike your own voice, "How do I know? The Indians may be hidden in the house."

Up to that time he had simply supposed himself (in giving you the laudanum) to be helping to make you the victim of a harmless practical joke. It now occurred to him that the laudanum had taken some effect on you which had not been foreseen by the doctor, any more than by himself. In the fear of an accident happening, he followed you softly to see what you would do.

He followed you to Miss Verinder's sitting-room, and saw you go in. You left the door open. He looked through the crevice thus produced, between the door and the post, before he ventured into the room himself.

In that position, he not only detected you in taking the Diamond out of the drawer—he also detected Miss Verinder, silently watching you from her bedroom, through her open door. He saw that she saw you take the Diamond too.

Before you left the sitting-room again, you hesitated a little. Mr. Godfrey took advantage of this hesitation to get back again to his bed room before you came out and discovered him. He had barely got back, before you got back too. You saw him (as he supposes) just as he was passing through the door of communication. At any rate, you called to him in a strange, drowsy voice.

He came back to you. You looked at him in a dull, sleepy way. You put the Diamond into his hand. You said to him, "Take it back, Godfrey, to our father's bank. It's safe there —it's not safe here." You turned away unsteadily, and put on your dressing-gown. You sat down in the large arm-chair in your room. You said, "I can't take it back to the bank. My head's like the head of a pin. I can't put two ideas together." Your head sank on the back of the chair —you heaved a heavy sigh—and you fell asleep.

Mr. Godfrey's position was clear. He, with the Diamond, into his own room. His statement is, that he came to no conclusion at that time—except that he would wait, and see what happened in the morning.

When the morning came, your language and conduct showed that you were in absolutely ignorant of what you had said and done overnight. At the same time, Miss Verinder's language and conduct showed that she was resolved to say nothing (in mercy to you) on her side. If Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite chose to keep the Diamond, he might do it with perfect impunity. The Moonstone stood between him and ruin. He put the Moonstone into his pocket.

V.

This was the story told by your cousin (under pressure of necessity) to Mr. Luker.

Mr. Luker believed the story to be, as to all main essentials, true—on this ground, that Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite was the last man to be fool to have invented it. Mr. Bruff and I agree with Mr. Luker, in considering it out of the truth of this story to be a perfectly reliable one.

The next question was the question of what Mr. Luker could do, in the matter of the Moonstone. He proposed the following terms, as the only terms on which he would consent to mix himself up with what was (even in his line of business) a doubtful and dangerous transaction.

Mr. Luker would consent to lend Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite the sum of two thousand pounds, on condition that the Moonstone was to be deposited with him as a pledge. If, at the expiration of one year from that date, Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite paid three thousand pounds to Mr. Luker, he was to receive back the Diamond, as a pledge redeemed. If he failed to produce the money at the expiration of the year, the pledge (otherwise the Moonstone) was to be considered as forfeited to Mr. Luker, who would, in this latter case, gain enormously make Mr. Godfrey a present of certain promissory notes of his (relating to former dealings) which were then in the money-lender's possession.

It is needless to say that Mr. Godfrey indignantly refused to listen to these monstrous terms. Mr. Luker, thereupon, handed him back the Diamond, and withdrew from the negotiation.

Your cousin went to the door, and came back again. How was he to be sure that the conversation of the evening would be kept strictly a secret between his friend and himself?

Mr. Luker didn't profess to know how. Mr. Godfrey suggested his name. Mr. Godfrey would have made him an accomplice, and might have counted on his silence as on a certainty. As things were, Mr. Luker must be guided by his own interests. If awkward inquiries were made, how could he be expected to compromise himself, for the sake of a man who had declined to deal with him?

Receiving this reply, Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite did, what all inexperienced and ordinary men do, when they find themselves caught in a trap. He looked about him in a state of helpless despair. The day of the month, recorded on a small blotting card in a box on the money-lender's chimney-piece, happened to be Sunday, his eye. It was the twenty-third of June. On the twenty-fourth he had three hundred pounds to pay to the young gentleman for whom he was trustee, and no chance of raising the money, except the chance that Mr. Luker had offered to him. But for this miserable obstacle, he might have taken the Diamond to Amsterdam, and have made a marketable commodity of it, by having it cut up into separate stones. As matters stood, he had no choice but to accept Mr. Luker's terms. After all, he had a trump at his disposal, in which to raise the three thousand pounds—and a year is a long time.

Mr. Luker drew out the necessary documents on the spot. When they were signed, he gave Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite two checks. One, dated June 23d, for three hundred pounds. Another, dated a week on, for the remaining balance of seventeen hundred pounds.

How the Moonstone was trusted to the keeping of Mr. Luker's bankers, and how the Indians treated Mr. Luker and Mr. Godfrey (after they had been done) you know already.

The next event in your cousin's life, refers again to Miss Verinder. He proposed marriage to her for the second time—and (after having been accepted) he consented, at her request, to consider the marriage as broken off. The real reason for making this concession has been penetrated by Mr. Bruff. Miss Verinder had only a life-interest in her mother's property—for three years. Her year of his marriage. But even if he got over this obstacle, there was another waiting for him in the background. The lady at the Villa had heard of his contemplated marriage. A superb woman, Mr. Blake, of the sort that are not to be trifled with—but with the light complexion and the Roman nose. She felt the utmost contempt for Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. It would be silent contempt if he made a handsome provision for her. Otherwise, it would be contempt with expression in it. Miss Verinder's life-interest allowed him no more hope of raising the "provision" than of raising the twenty thousand pounds. Provision or no provision, he really couldn't marry, under all the circumstances.

How he tried his luck again with another lady, and how that attempt ended, I must leave on the question of money, you know already. You also know of the legacy of five thousand pounds, left to him absolutely and unfettered, by one of those many admirers among the soft sex whose good graces this fascinating man had contrived to win. That legacy (as the event has proved) led him to his death.

I have ascertained that when he went abroad, on getting his five thousand pounds, he went to Amsterdam. There he made all the necessary arrangements for having the Diamond cut into separate stones. He came home (in England), and redeemed the Moonstone on the appointed day. A few days were allowed to elapse (as a precaution in case of the Indians watching him) and jewel was actually taken out of the bank. If he had got safe with it to Amsterdam there would have been just time (early in July) for stones and February fifty (when the young gentleman came of age) to cut the Diamond, and to produce a marketable commodity (polished or unpolished) of the separate stones. Judge from this what money he had to put into the bank. As it actually ran. It was "neck or nothing" with him—if ever it was "neck or nothing" with a man yet.

I have only to add, in closing the narrative this Report, that there is a chance of laying hands on the Indians, and of recovering the Moonstone in that way. They are known (in Godfrey's belief, believe) on their passage to Bombay in an East Indiaman. The ship (barring accidents) will touch at no other port on the way out; and the authorities of Bombay (already communicated with by letter overland) will be prepared to board the vessel the moment she comes to her anchor.

I have the honor to remain, dear Sir, your obedient servant, RICHARD CUFF (late sergeant in the Detective Force, Scotland Yard, London).

VI.

SEVENTH NARRATIVE.

In a Letter from Mr. Candy.

FRITHSTON, Yorkshire, Sept. 29, 1849.—Dear Mr. Franklin Blake, you will anticipate the sad news I have to tell you, on finding your letter to Dr. Candy unanswered by me, unopened in this inclosure. He died in my arms, at sunrise, on Wednesday last.

I am too broken for having failed to warn you that his end was at hand. He expressly forbade me to write to you. "I am indebted to Mr. Franklin Blake," he said, "for a legacy and some happy days. Don't distress him, Mr. Candy —don't distress him."

His relations, up to the last six hours of his life, were terrible to see. In the intervals of remission, when his mind was clear, I entreated him to tell me of any wishes that I could help him might write. He asked to be forgiven for refusing my thing to me. And then he said—not bitterly—that he would be glad to have his Diamond tau and unknown. He maintained that resolution to the last. There is no hope now of making any discoveries concerning it. The story is a blank.

The day before he died he told me where to find all his papers. I brought them to him on his bed. There was a little bundle of old letters among them, which (as there was his unfinished book. There was his Diary—in many-bound volumes. He opened the volume for this year, and tore out the first few leaves, containing notes of the time when you and he were together. "Give those," he said, "to Mr. Franklin Blake. In years to come he may be interested in looking back at what is written there." Then he clasped his hands, and prayed God fervently to bless you, and those dear to you. He said he should like to see you again. But the next moment he altered his mind. "No," he answered, when I offered to write. "I won't distress him." I won't distress him!"

At his request, I next collected the other papers—that is to say, the bundle of letters, the unfinished book, and the volumes of the Diary —and inclosed them all in one wrapper, sealed with my own seal. "Promise," he said, "that you will put this into my coffin with your own hand; and that you will see that no other hand touches it afterward."

* NOTE.—Wherever the Report touches on the events of the birthday, or of the three days following, it accompanies with Betteredge's Narrative—Chapters VIII. to XIII.

I gave him my promise. And the promise has been performed.

He asked me to do one other thing for him, which it cost me a hard struggle to consent to. He said, "Let my grave be forgotten. Give me your word of honor that you will allow no monument of any sort to be put over the nameless tombstone—to mark the place of my burial. Let me sleep, nameless. Let me rest, unknown." He tried to speak to him but to no effect. He resolution he became for the first, and only time, violently agitated. I could not bear to see it; and I gave way. Nothing but a little grass mound marks the place of his rest. In time the tombstones will rise round it. And the people who come after me will look, and wonder, at the nameless grave.

As I have told you, for six hours before his death his sufferings ceased. He dozed a little. I think he dreamed. Once or twice he smiled. A woman's name, as I suppose—the name of "Ida"—escaped from on his lips at this time. A few minutes before the end came he asked me to lift him on his pillow, to see the sun rise through the window. He was very weak. His head fell on my shoulder. He whispered, "It's coming!" Then he said, "Kiss me!" I kissed his forehead. On a sudden he lifted his head. The sunlight touched his face. A beautiful expression, like a heavenly expression, came over it. He cried out three times, "Peace! peace! peace!" His head sank back again on my shoulder, and the long trouble of his life was at an end.

So he has gone from us. This was, as I think, a great mercy though the world never knew him. He bore a hard life bravely. He had the sweetest temper I have ever met with. Dear Mr. Blake, you were his only true friend. Perhaps I have never been quite myself again since my illness. Sometimes I think of giving up my practice, and going abroad, and trying what some of the foreign baths and waters will do for me.

It is reported here that you and Miss Verinder are to be married next month. Please to accept my best congratulations.

The pages of your friend's Journal are waiting for you at my house—sealed up, with your name on the wrapper. I was afraid to trust them in my son's hands.

My best respects and good wishes attend Miss Verinder. I remain, dear Mr. Franklin Blake, truly yours, THOMAS CANDY.

EIGHTH NARRATIVE.

Contributed by Gabriel Betteredge.

I AM the person (as you remember, no doubt) who laid the two packets, on the table, containing my story. I am also the person who is left behind, as it were, to close the story up.

Let nobody suppose that I have any last words to say here concerning the Indian Diamond. I hold that unlucky jewel in abhorrence; and I rejoice in the prospect of having that mine for ever. news of the Moonstone as you may, at the present time, be expecting to receive. My purpose, in this place, is to state a fact in the history of the family which has been passed over by every body, and which I won't allow to be disrespectfully mentioned in that way. The fact to which I allude is—the marriage of Miss Rachel and Mr. Franklin Blake. This interesting event took place at my house in Yorkshire, on Tuesday, October ninth, eighteen hundred and forty-nine. I had a new suit of clothes on the occasion. And the married couple went to spend the honey-moon in Scotland.

Family festivals having been rare enough at our house, during my master's and mistress's death, I enjoyed on this occasion of the wedding—to having (on the latter part of the day) taken a drop too much on the strength of it.

If you have ever done the same sort of thing yourself you will understand and feel for me. If you have not, you will most likely say, "Disgusting old man! why does he tell us this?" The reason why is soon told.

Having, then, taken my drop (bless you! you have got your favorite vice, too; only your vice is humble, and mine isn't yours), I next applied the one infallible remedy—that remedy being as you know, Robinson Crusoe. Where I opened the volume at random, I was not particular. Where the lines of print at last left off running into one another I know, however, perfectly well. It was the page when Friday first sees the print of his domestic bit concerning Robinson Crusoe's marriage, as follows:

"Oh those Thoughts I considered my new Engagement, that I had a Wife"—(Observe! so had Mr. Franklin!)—"one Child born"—(Observe again! that might yet be Mr. Franklin's case, too!)—"and my Wife then"—What Robinson Crusoe's wife did or did not do "then," I never found out. For, at that moment, I dropped the Child with my pencil, and put a morsel of paper for a mark to keep the place: "Let you there," I said, "till the marriage of Mr. Franklin and Miss Rachel is some months older—and then we'll see!"

The months passed (more than I had bargained for), and no occasion presented itself for disturbing Robinson Crusoe in the book. It was not till this present month of November, eighteen hundred and fifty, that Mr. Franklin came into my room, in high spirits, and said, "Betteredge! I have got some news for you! Something is going to happen in the house before we are many months older."

"Does it concern the family, Sir?" I asked.

"It decidedly concerns the family," says Mr. Franklin.

"Has your good lady any thing to do with it, if you please, Sir?"

"She has a great deal to do with it," says Mr. Franklin, beginning to look a little surprised.

"You needn't say a word more, Sir," I answered. "God bless you both! I'm heartily glad to hear it."

Mr. Franklin stared like a person thunderstruck. "May I venture to inquire where you got your information?" he asked. "I only got mine (imparted in the strictest secrecy) five minutes since."

Here was an opportunity of producing Robinson Crusoe! Here was a chance of reading that domestic bit about the child, which I had marked on the day of Mr. Franklin's marriage! I read those miraculous words with an emphasis which laid them palpably—and then I looked him severely in the face. "Now, Sir, do you believe in Robinson Crusoe?" I asked, with a solemnity suitable to the occasion.

"Betteredge!" says Mr. Franklin, with equal solemnity, "I'm convinced at last." He shook hands with me—and I felt that I had converted him.

With the relation of this extraordinary circumstance, my acquaintance in these pages comes to an end. Let nobody laugh at the unique anecdote here related. You are welcome to be as merry as you please over every thing else I have written. But when I write of Robinson Crusoe, by the Lord, it's serious—and I request you to take it accordingly!

When this is said, all is said. Ladies and gentlemen, I make my bow, and shut up the story.

THE EPILOGUE.

THE FINDING OF THE DIAMOND.

THE STATEMENT OF SERGEANT CUFF'S MAN (1849).

On the twenty-seventh of June last I received instructions from Sergeant Cuff to follow three men, suspected of murder, and described as Indians. We found them soon on the Tower Wharf that morning, embarking on board the steamer bound for Rotterdam.

I left London by a steamer belonging to another company, which sailed on the morning of Thursday, the 28th.

Arriving at Rotterdam, I succeeded in finding the commander of the Wednesday's steamer. He informed me that the Indians had certainly been passengers on board his vessel as far as Gravesend only. Off that place, one of the three had inquired at what time they would reach Calais. On being informed that the steamer was bound to Rotterdam, the spokesman of the party expressed the greatest surprise and distress at the mistake which he and his friends had made. They were all willing (he said) to sacrifice their passage-money, if the commander of the steamer would only put them on shore. Commiserating their position, as foreigners in a strange land, and knowing no reason for detaining them, the commander signed for a shore boat, and the three men left the vessel.

This proceeding of the Indians having been plainly resolved on beforehand, as a means of preventing their being traced, I lost no time in returning to England. I left the steamer at Gravesend, and discovered that the Indians had gone from that place to London. Thence I again traced them as having left for Plymouth. Inquiries made at Plymouth proved that they had sailed, forty-eight hours previously, in the Bewley Castle East Indiaman, bound direct for Bombay.

On receiving this intelligence, Sergeant Cuff caused the authorities at Bombay to be communicated with by telegraph—so that the vessel might be boarded by the police immediately after mooring the port. This step having been taken, my connection with the matter came to an end. I have heard nothing more of it since that time.

II.

THE STATEMENT OF THE CAPTAIN (1849).

I AM requested by Sergeant Cuff to set in writing certain facts, concerning three men (believed to be Hindoos) who were passengers, last summer, in the ship Bewley Castle, bound for Bombay direct, under my command.

The Hindoos joined us at Plymouth. On the passage out I had no complaint of their conduct. They were berthed in the forward part of the vessel. I had but few occasions myself of personally seeing them.

In the latter part of the voyage we had the misfortune to be becalmed for three days and nights off the coast of Africa. I have not got the ship's Journal to refer to, and I can not now call to mind the latitude and longitude. As to our position, therefore, I can only allow for the certainty that the currents drifted us toward the land, and that, when the wind found us again, we steered our course with twenty-four hours' onward.

The discipline of a ship (as all sea-faring persons know) becomes relaxed in a long calm. The discipline of the cabin became relaxed. Certain gentlemen among the passengers got some of the smaller boats launched, and amused themselves by rowing about, and swimming, when the weather was evening time, was cool enough to let them divert themselves in that way. The boats, it was done with, ought to have been slung up again in their places. Instead of this they were left moored to the ship's side. What with the heat, and what with the vexation of the weather, neither officers nor men seemed to be in heart for their duty during the calm lasted.

On the third night nothing unusual was heard or seen by the watch on deck. When the morning came the boats were missed—and the two Hindoos were next reported to be missing too.

If these men had stolen the boat shortly after dark (which I have no doubt they did), we were near enough to the land to make it safe to send in pursuit of them. When the calm broke we made in the morning. I have no doubt they got ashore. In this calm weather (making all due allowance for fatigue and clumsy rowing), before sixteen hours

On reaching our port, I there learned, for the first time, the reason my three passengers had for seizing their opportunity of escaping from the ship. I could only make the same statement to the authorities which I have made here. They considered me to blame for allowing the discipline of the vessel to be relaxed. I have expressed my regret on this score to them and to my owners. Since that time nothing has been heard, to my knowledge, of the three Hindoos. I have no more to add to what is here written.

III.

THE STATEMENT OF MR. MURTHWAITE (1850).

(In a Letter to Mr. Bruff.)

Have you any recollection, my dear Sir, of a semi-savage person whom you met out at dinner, in London, in the autumn of forty-eight? Permit me to remind you that the person's name was Murthwaite, and that you and he had a long conversation together after dinner. The fact related to an Indian Diamond, called The Moonstone, and to a conspiracy then in existence to get possession of the gem.

Since that time I have been wandering in Central Asia. During I have drifted back to the scene of some of my past adventures in the north and northwest of India. About a fortnight since I found myself in a certain district or province (but little known to Europeans) called Kattiawar.

Here an adventure befell me, in which (incredible as it may appear) you are personally interested.

In the wild regions of Kattiawar (and how wild they are you will understand, when I tell you that even the husbandmen plow the land armed to the teeth) the population is fanatically devoted to the old Hindoo religion—to the ancient worship of Brahmah and Vishnu. The few Mohammedan families, thinly scattered about the villages in the interior, are afraid to taste meat of any kind. A Mohammedan even suspected of killing that sacred animal, the cow, is as a matter of course, put to death without mercy in these parts, by the pious Hindoo neighbors who surround him. To strengthen the religious enthusiasm of the people, two of the most famous shrines of Hindoo pilgrimage are contained within the boundaries of Kattiawar. One of them is Dwarka, the favorite resort of the pig-killers. The other is the sacred city of Somnauth—sacked and destroyed, so long since as the eleventh century, by the Mohammedan conqueror, Mahmoud of Ghizni.

Finding myself, for the second time, in these romantic regions, I resolved not to leave Kattiawar without looking once more on the magnificent ruins of Somnauth. Curiously enough, where I planned to do this, I was (as nearly as I could calculate it) some three days distant, journeying on foot, from Somnauth itself.

I had not been long on the road before I noticed that other people—by twos and threes—appeared to be traveling in the same direction as myself.

To such of these as spoke to me I gave myself out as a wandering Englishman, from a distant province, bound on a pilgrimage. It is needless to say that my dress was of the sort to carry out this description. Add, that I knew the language as well as I know my own, and that I am lean enough and brown enough to make it no easy matter to tell whether a foreign-looking man will understand that I passed master with the people readily; not as one of themselves, but as a stranger from a distant part of their own country.

On the second day the number of Hindoos traveling in the same direction had increased by tens and hundreds. On the third day the throng had swollen to thousands; all slowly converging to one point—the city of Somnauth.

A trifling service which I was able to render to one of my fellow-pilgrims during the third day's journey proved the means of introducing me to certain Hindoos of the higher caste. From these men I learned that the multitude was on its way to a great religious ceremony, which was to take place on a hill at a little distance from Somnauth. The ceremony was in honor of the god of the Moon; and it was to be held at night.

The crowd detained us as we drew near to the place of celebration. By the time we reached the hill the moon was high in the heavens. My Hindoo friends possessed some special privilege which enabled them to gain access to the shrine. They kindly allowed me to accompany them. When we arrived at the place we found the shrine hidden from our view by a curtain hung between two magnificent trees. Beneath the trees a flat projection of rock jutted out, and formed a species of natural platform. Below this I stood, in company with my Hindoo friends.

Looking back down the hill, the view presented the grandest spectacle of Nature and Man, in combination, that I have ever seen. The lower slope of the eminence melted imperceptibly into a grassy plain, the place of the meeting of three rivers. On one side the graceful winding of the waters stretched away, now visible, now hidden by trees, as far as the eye could see. On the other the waveless ocean slept in the calm of the night. People this lovely scene with tens of thousands of human creatures, all dressed in white, stretching down the sides of the hill, overflowing into the plain, and fringing the near banks of the winding rivers. Light this halt of the pilgrims by the wild red flames of crssets and torches streaming up at intervals from every part of the innumerable throng. Imagine the moonlight of the East, pouring in unclouded glory over all—and you will form some idea of the view that met me, when I looked forth from the summit of the hill.

A strain of plaintive music, played on stringed instruments and flutes, recalled my attention to the hidden shrine.

figures of three men. In the central figure of the three I recognized the man to whom I had spoken in England, when the Indians appeared on the terrace at Lady Verinder's house. The other two, who had been his companions on that occasion, were no doubt his companions also on this.

One of the Hindoos, near whom I was standing, saw me start. In a whisper he explained to me the participation of the three figures on the platform of rock.

They were Brahmins (he said) who had forfeited their caste in the service of the god. The god had commanded that their purification should be the purification by pilgrimage. On that night the three men were to part. In three separate directions, they were to set forth as pilgrims to the shrines of India. Never more were they to look on each other's faces. Never more were they to rest on their wanderings, from the day which witnessed their separation to the day which witnessed their death.

As those words were whispered to me the plaintive music ceased. The three men prostrated themselves on the rock, before the curtain which hid the shrine. They rose—they looked on one another—they embraced. Then they descended separately among the people. The people made way for them in dead silence. In three different directions I saw the crowd part at one and the same moment. Slowly the grand, white mass of the people closed together again. The back of the doomed men through the ranks of their fellow-mortals was obliterated. We saw them no more.

A new strain of music, loud and jubilant, rose from the hidden shrine. The crowd around me shuddered and pressed together.

The curtain between the trees was drawn aside, and the shrine was disclosed to view.

There, raised high on a throne, seated on his typical carriage, with his four arms stretching toward the four corners of the earth, there soared above us, dark and awful in the mystic light of heaven, the god of the Moon. And there, in the forehead of the deity, gleamed the yellow Diamond, whose splendor had last shone on me, in England, from the bosom of a woman's dress!

Yes; after the lapse of eight centuries the Moonstone looks forth once more over the walls of the sacred city in which its story first began. Slow it has found its way back to its wild native land—by what accident, or by what crime, the Indians regained possession of their sacred gem—may be in your knowledge, but is not in mine. You have lost sight of it in England, and (if I know any thing of this people) you have lost sight of it forever.

So the years pass, and repeat each other; so the same events revolve in the cycle of Time. What will be the next adventures of the Moonstone? Who can tell?

THE END.

CHILDREN'S SELFISHNESS.

A LOVE of property is generally considered so harmless in a child that it is encouraged rather than controlled. But surely it would be wise, as well as kind, to accompany such culture to bring up a child with the idea that almost all which it enjoys is lent or given to it by others, and that very little is really its own. Out of that little, not out of other people's property, should come the gifts of the child; the constant sharing with others of all which it may enjoy, not being enforced as a painful duty, but permitted as a privilege, without which no good thing would be perfectly good or enjoyable.

There are parents who conscientiously make their children always pick off a little crumb from their cake for the mother, the nurse, or perhaps the elder sister, who has conscientiously received the crumb into their mouths with many grimaces, indicating the immense value and magnitude of the gift, while the little hero who has conferred this vast benefit sits down with satisfaction and gobbles up his huge slice of cake. This is considered to be making the child generous; but alas! how little is this generosity like that which will be required of him afterward, perhaps at some heart-rending sacrifice, before he can be a truly generous man.

I know of nothing more likely to produce the effect desired with regard to propriety than the making of an equal distribution, wherever this can be done. The child, I think, should give as much as he takes from, just as we are required to do in after-life by good manners and good feeling. And here would be another useful lesson, that of teaching the child to share the common lot without complaining, than which there are few lessons which come to be learned in early life, few more difficult to learn for the first time in mature age.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NEW, GOOD, and I were talking of the Western Indians and their tribal relationships, when I remarked that I thought the Kaws were an offshoot of the Kansas or Sioux. NEW replied that his acquaintance was always mad when he Kaw-ed him the Cross. Yes, said GOOD, or from some other Cause.

AT one time during the war Captain J—— of the Sixty-third —— was on duty at Corinth, Miss., as field-officer of the day. An attack from the enemy being considered probable, the men were informed, received, he was sent for by the commanding general during the night, and questioned as to the condition of the grand guards and outposts. He reported promptly that he had made the round of his lines, and found them all in a "passable" condition.

EXTRACTS FROM A MODEL LOVE-LETTER.

"MY DEAR JESSIE,—Every time I think of you my heart flops up and down like a churo-dasher. As a cooing swimmeth with delight in a mud-puddle, so swim I in a sea of glory. Visions of ecstatic rapture, thicker than the hair of a blacking-brush and brighter than the hues on a lemuning-bird's plumes, visit me in my slumbers; and borne on their inevitable wings, your image stands before me, and I reach out to grasp it; then my self-pointer snapping at a blue-bottle fly. When I first beheld your angelic perfections I was bewildered, and my brain whirled around like a tumble-bee under a glass tumbler. . . . Since the light of your face fell upon my life I sometimes feel as if I could lift myself by my boot straps to the top of a church steeple. You and night live on my thought. Your hair is like the mane of a sorrel horse powdered with gold; and the brass pin skewered through your waterfall that with me unbounded awe. I can forward to sometime that the elbow of an old coat, and whither than seventeen hundred lions. Your eyes are glorious to behold. In their liquid depths I see legions of little Cupids battling and fighting like cowcats of nine at the sassy cracker. Your nose is from a chunk of Parian mozzle, and your mouth puckered with sweetness. Nectar lingers on your lips like honey on a bear's paw, and myriads of indefinite blessings are here ready to fly out and light somewhere like young bluebirds out of the parent nest. Your laugh rings on my ears like the wash-tub's strain, or the bleat of a stray lamb on the bleak hill-side. Your fingers are as delicate as the bowsers in bede of roses, or like hollows in cakes of homemade sugar. . . . I am trying to fly to your presence and pour out the burning eloquence of my love as thrifty housewives pour out the last coffee. As the sun-flower hungers for the light of day, the castious mouse for the fresh bone in the rat-trap, as a lean pup hankers after new milk, so I long for thee. . . . If these few remarks will enable you to see the inside of my soul, and me to win your affections, I shall be as happy as a woodpecker in a cherry-tree or a stage-horse in a green pasture. If you can not reciprocate my thrilling passions I will pine away like a peach-tree bedbug, and fall away from the flourishing vine of life an untimely grape. . . . And in the coming years, when the shadows grow long from the hills and the philosophic frog sings his evening hymn, you, happy in nature's love, can come and drop a tear and toss a clod upon the last resting-place of "Well, that's clever. I always disliked this nasty river water, especially in dog-days."

"When did you get any money?"

"Last Saturday night."

"Why, how much did you get?"

"Four dollars and a half."

"Why, that's rather small."

SUNDAY MORNING IN THE FOURTH WARD, NEW YORK.—[See Page 505.]

THE "WICKEDEST MAN" AS HE IS.

ONE of our New York city reporters has lately been exciting the sympathies of citizens and the curiosity of friends at a distance by a highly-colored sensational account of JOHN ALLEN, the keeper of a low dance-house in Water Street, who is designated as "the wickedest man in New York." The story, told with the perfect art of a practiced sensational paragraphist, has been widely circulated and extensively believed.

It really contains not more than a grain of truth, and that grain is distorted and discolored until it is not recognizable. The fact is that JOHN ALLEN is probably no worse, and certainly no better, than his peculiar class. He is the keeper of one of the lowest of the many vile haunts for sailors to be found in this as in every great maritime city; and he deliberately, elaringly, and cunningly, makes money by the prostitution of women and the drunkenness of men. He is a man with some little education, for the most part picked up from newspapers and the current literature of the day; but he is superior in this respect only to the men in the same line of business, and far inferior in general intelligence to the majority of our mechanics. He is without moral sentiments, and never had a religious idea; he reads religious papers, tracts, books, hymns, etc., apparently only for the purpose of making a display and exhibition of his knowledge, just as negro minstrels sometimes amuse the thoughtless by burlesques of religious exercises. He is a powerful man, and his rough-est visitors hold him in awe; being a shrewd man, he knows the importance of keeping an orderly house, and it is due to him to say that he enforces order in his house and vicinity. He is as good as an extra policeman in his block, and hence the certain amount of respect in which the police hold him. Our sensationally-disposed friend, with a number of missionaries, visited and saw the man and his establishment under peculiar circumstances. When any member of the Health Board, which possesses certain powers and much influence with the Police Commissioners, visits his house, JOHN ALLEN naturally makes it look as clean and healthy as possible; when any of the various city missionaries, who have their influence also with the Police Commissioners, call, he "puts on his religious face," as he expresses it, and makes his establishment appear as respectable and moral as possible.

These were the ideas which he expressed to this writer when he, with an artist, called to see and portray the house and the man just as they are. In fact it was the doleful burden of his whole conversation that MR. DYER, his biographer, had painted him too white. He seemed to feel, and certainly argued, that he, unlike another individual who keeps an extensive dance-house in even hotter regions than Water Street, was black-er than he was painted. We can not quote all the language which he used in expressing this idea to us.

"MR. DYER," he said, very nearly as we give it here, though not verbatim, oaths, indecency, and all, "MR. DYER saw my place under peculiar circumstances. When a gentleman comes here we endeavor to treat him right. We try to entertain each man in the way he likes best; if a minister comes, we can sing hymns with him, and he can hear CHESTER say his Catechism; but we've got liquor, and there's the women for them as has the stamps to spend that way. (Mother! mother!" he exclaimed to his wife, as a couple of men walked through the outer room into the dance-hall—a sort of cage where the women seemed to be confined like wild beasts—"a couple of drinks for these gentlemen.") Then he returned to his argument with us, telling of the performances at night, taking care to impress on our minds the fact that they were very different from those which the ministers witnessed, and illustrating the style of his evening visitors by imitations of their drunken manner, and quotations from their filthy and profane language.

He denounced MR. DYER very roundly, and spoke of him with great contempt as a "sensation writer." He objected to being called "the wickedest man in New York."

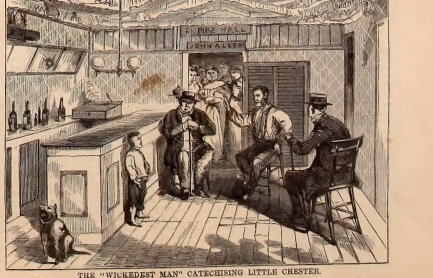
"I am not the wickedest man," he said. "I do a great deal more for the poor than the sensation writers, any how. I feed the hungry and clothe the naked. I give away all my cast-off clothing, and I've taken many a poor fellow to Chatham Street and bought him shoes. And I let 'em sleep here by the stove on cold nights. My neighbors will tell you that there ain't a more charitable man in the street than JOHN ALLEN."

And certainly the neighbors—police, merchants, and all—say JOHN ALLEN is a quiet, peaceful, law-abiding, generous, and charitable man.

"And MR. DYER speaks of my house as if it was a den of prostitution," he said, suddenly, after a brief conversation with a drunken peddler who had stopped at the door to pass the compliments of the morning, and swear a while at a truckman who had "insulted" him. "It's nothing of the kind. It's a boarding-house—just like yours," he added to our artist, thereby causing that gentleman to wince a little, and then blandly smile his appreciation of the remark. "The women pay their board just as you do. Many of them are old, and don't make money and earn any; but I never turn 'em out into the street on that account. They pay in what they make, and do odd chores about the house. The other women who make more, pay their board and spend the rest for clothes—" And then, as if suspecting some one would suggest it, he quickly added, "and whisky."

JOHN ALLEN, THE "WICKEDEST MAN," AND HIS SON CHESTER.

THE DANCE-HALL AT THE "WICKEDEST MAN'S" HOUSE.



Apparently the most of it went for whisky, for the several women that we saw had very little clothing upon their persons, and a great deal of the peculiar color that comes from excessive drinking in their faces. They were old, ugly, haggard, bestial, and toothless—"One set of teeth to seven women," suggested a companion—and generally pitiable beyond expression.

ALLEN was asked in regard to his promise to Commissioner ACTON to quit the business.

"I did promise," he said, "Mr. ACTON sent for me to come to head-quarters. I went up, and there I found DYER with him. I had made up my mind not to speak to DYER again because of his misstatements about me, but there I was face to face with him, and I would not run away. Mr. ACTON asked me if I would quit the business, and after a while I said I would, and promised to quit by May 1, or sooner if I could. And I will," he added, emphatically, "for the business is ruined. I'm overrun by people that come here to look at me, as if I was a wild beast. They bore me to death, and don't spend any money. I have to see hundreds of them a day."

This last remark was meant for a clerical-looking gentleman, who had entered the room a few minutes previously. He had come, as he said, to pay his respects to Mr. ALLEN, and say how much he admired him for his determination to quit the business.

"I'm much obliged to you," replied JOHN ALLEN, extending his hand. "We always try to treat our friends right. I've had a good many visitors lately. I'm always glad to see all them that come to spend their stamps. I don't care much to see any others. The fact is," he added, in an under-tone to the writer, "I'm bored to death by just such fellows."

As we had not come to "spend any stamps," I suggested to the artist to take the hint and leave. He remained, however, to witness the examination of the boy, little CHESTER, which was announced as the next feature in the entertainment. This writer, having very little disposition for any further performances, took his leave. The rest of the story is from the pen of the artist:

"Want to see what the boy knows, do yer?" said ALLEN, to the group of wonder-seekers which had congregated in his little outside bar. "CHESTER, come in here!" he shouted, to an active assister in a juvenile gutter-game going on just in front of "EMPIRE HALL." The boy came at once, but was somewhat retarded in his movement by a disposition on the part of his nether garment to fall about his heels. "Stretch yourself, Sir!" said ALLEN; and the boy quickly inverted himself and stood on his head with bare toes clutching at the edge of the top of the bar-counter.

"Up with yer!" shouted ALLEN, again. "Want yer to talk; and mind yer look the gentleman there square in the eye, too! Speak up! Le's hear yer! Who's the first man?"

"Adam, Sir."

"And what's the first woman's name?"

"Eve, Sir."

"D'she have any children, and what's the oldest one's name?"

"Cain, Sir."

"What did he do?"

"Killed Abel, Sir."

"What did the Lord do ter him?"

"Put the mark of sin on his brow."

"Can't hear yer, can't hear yer!" roared ALLEN; and the boy exerted himself anew, answering promptly a number of Biblical questions. "What der yer believe?" shouted ALLEN. "Give us yer creed, CHESTER?" The boy at once repeated the Creed without a single mistake.

"Lem me see now," said ALLEN, seating himself. "CHESTER, yer know geography and something about a good many things. How many teeth's a man got?"

"Thirty-two, Sir."

"An' how many's a boy got?"

"Twenty-four, Sir."

"An' how's a baby off?"

"Ain't got none, Sir."

It is unnecessary to follow the examination through. Several questions in Natural Philosophy were answered promptly and in the main correctly. History was the next subject under consideration; in that study the child's school report must be very perfect.

"How many Presidents have we had?"

"Eighteen."

"And, CHESTER, yer know whether there was any Masons among the Presidents?"

"Yes, Sir, all but one was."

"What's his name?"

"FILLMORE, Sir."

"Give us a Bible story, sing us a song, an' we'll let you off."

CHESTER paused a moment; then told how Samson was the strongest man, and gave some account of the use that he made of his strength.

"Mr. ALLEN," remarked a reverend visitor, in a voice tremblingly earnest, "take care of that boy. Do not ruin his life as you have thus far ruined your own. How old is he, Mr. ALLEN?"

ALLEN deigned the gentleman no reply, but quietly asked: "How old yer, CHESTER?" "Six years old, Sir!" "When, Sir?" "27th of May last, Sir!" "What time?" "Half past nine o'clock in the morning, Sir!"

"But," continued the clergyman, "does the little boy know what he has been telling us as a parrot, or does he comprehend what he has learned?"

"Give me that paper," quoth ALLEN to one of the persons near him; "yer know the boy never saw it. Take that paper, CHESTER! Want to hear what there is in it."

The child read with facility, and quite as rapidly as most boys of ten or twelve years of age, four or five paragraphs, containing words that children are prone to believe were placed in the spelling-book to promote discomfort and deteriorate their school reports.

"Now sing us a song, CHESTER," said ALLEN, taking the paper from the boy. "Reb first; then give us a Union one. Set yer own key if you like," he added, as the boy looked inquiringly at him, "an' I'll help yer."

The child hummed the scale, struck a note.

"Too low," said ALLEN. "Want 'bout G flat."

The next trial proved to be successful, and father and son sang "Rally round the Flag." The song finished, CHESTER was remunerated by the visitors, and permitted by his father to "git into the street."

When our artist was about to leave he received a cordial invitation from the proprietor to call again. It is the usual invitation of JOHN ALLEN to his friends, and for the benefit of himself and his friends we give it as he uttered it. "Come in to-night," he said; "come in to-night and see the dancing, and bring plenty of stamps with you."

Such is this man and his house; our account and illustrations are by no means exaggerated; the portrait of the man is a photograph, and the picture of his character is drawn from life; the house—exterior and interior—is truthfully portrayed; and what makes the story still more painful is the fact that it is the true story of numberless other men and places in this city. There are dozens of such places along the wharves in the Fourth and other down-town wards, and life in that district is horrible beyond description. Perhaps the illustrations by Mr. STANLEY FOX of ALLEN's establishment, and the large picture on page 504 of "Sunday-morning in the Fourth Ward," will give the reader an idea of what we can not express in words. The dwellers in country places and small cities have no idea how the lives of hundreds of thousands of creatures pent up in New York are thus wasted. Such groups as we represent are to be found on any Sunday or holiday morning. Just such idle men, slatternly women, and ragged, unkempt children, crowd round the closed doors of the public houses, and loll against the walls, or play in the gutters. There is little or no escape for them into better scenes than their own alleys, courts, and lanes, fetid and vile, in spite of sanatory laws and Health Officers. They must always be so as long as the dwellers therein have no wish to make them better; so long as infancy is educated in filth, both moral and physical, the man will not feel the degradation which surrounds him, and all manner of missionaries, except the Policeman and the Sanitary Officer, will, we fear, be in vain. The Legislature which closed the doors of the pernicious gin-shop on the Sabbath has accomplished a great work; the one that forces the tenement-house landlord to see that his rooms are not crowded to suffocation, that compels him to let his suffocated tenants have a little ventilation, that empties the cellars of the city of the mass of humanity stored therein and drives them into the air and light, will have done an equally good service to the cause of humanity and religion.

A WOMAN'S JUSTICE.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER V.

WHEN the gentlemen returned to the library they found Cecil seated, Major Middleton's desk open before her. She was very pale, but her hands no longer trembled, nor did her voice falter. She recalled, in a few sentences, her brother's last words—how, in the first instance, he had exacted a promise from her to destroy without inspecting every thing contained in that desk; and how that, afterward, in one of those violent fits of irritation to which he was subject—more than usually increased by the knowledge that Mr. Chester had been in the house—he had forced a promise from her that she would read whatever she found there. Then, unfastening the secret recess, she produced the miniatures, letters, and marriage certificate.

It was curious to observe how Mr. Cathcart warmed to his work the moment he scented a mystery. He looked at the miniature; he had known Cecil and her brother all their lives. "No possible mistake," he said, "as to who is the gentleman; but who is the lady?"

Cecil placed the certificate before him.

The lawyer scanned it without and then with his spectacles, and passed it to Mr. Chester, simply saying, "Awkward!" He then read the letters. Nothing could be gathered from the expression of his countenance, as one by one, after asking Cecil if he were to pass them on to Chester, he did so.

"The witness Dacre?" inquired Mr. Cathcart, carelessly.

"Is drowned—dead."

Mr. Cathcart twirled a pen.

"There!" he said; "you have obeyed your brother's last injunction, and now you can obey his first. These papers need give you no uneasiness."

"True," said Cecil. "I have simply to seek out my brother's wife and child, and resign to them what I imagined, until this evening, was mine."

Mr. Cathcart laid his two hands firmly on the edge of the table, fixed his eyes steadily on Cecil, pushed himself back in his chair, while Cecil spoke. She became deathly white, but there was no tremor in her voice.

Ronald Chester moved as if he were going to place his hand on those of Cecil, which were clasped together on the table; but he did not do it.

"My dear Miss Middleton, my dear young lady," said Mr. Cathcart, "you can not, surely, be serious? Any woman can sign herself 'your affectionate wife;' and the major must have had strong reasons, strong cause, indeed, against this —this—person to have written these denunciatory words across so fair a face."

"When men are tired of women they write any thing," said Cecil.

"As to the certificate, it may be only waste paper," persisted Mr. Cathcart.

"It is my duty," said Cecil, "to ascertain whether it is so or not."

"You may depend upon it, if the case is tangible the woman will see to it."

"Suppose she is dead, who is to see justice done to my brother's child if I do not?"

"Believing the child to be your brother's, which might be questioned."

"I thought of that," said Cecil. "But from these letters, you see, the fact must have been admitted."

"Really"—and Mr. Cathcart smiled that peculiarly doubting lawyer's smile, which seems to have been patented by the profession—"really, my dear lady, you seem very anxious to get rid of your good fortune."

Cecil shivered from head to foot. She returned the melancholy gaze of Ronald's eyes with an intense look of love. When she could command her voice, she said:

"Justice costs me very dear, but I must render justice."

Mr. Cathcart shrugged his shoulders, and inquired "To whom?—To yourself and my friend here, or to these mysterious personages, whose very existence your brother evidently desired to ignore, until seized upon by—by— Well, no matter. But he made no provision in any way for his wife and child."

"His injustice could be no excuse for mine."

"What do you propose to do?"

"I fear," answered Cecil—and now her voice faltered, for she was well-nigh worn down by contending emotions—"I have nothing to propose—no plan to set before you; but I wish to discover Mrs. Middleton and her child. You will know how to set about it. I also wish those documents copied, I retaining the originals. I want this done at once, and I have not strength to copy them myself; the last four or five hours have unnerved me."

"You had better speak with Miss Middleton on this subject before it goes any further," said Mr. Cathcart, rising. "I will wait in the next room."

For some minutes no word passed between them. Ronald Chester stood beside the one love of his whole life, and she laid her head on his bosom, sobbing that dry, hard, tearless sob of agony which can be felt and heard, but not described.

"It was a dreary duty," she whispered, "and oh the cruelty of leaving me such a task! Ronald, my love, my life, you know what is my duty."

"Clearly, Cecil," he replied, "clearly, you are doing what is right, and what is honest. My noble Cecil! Never so fondly loved, never so highly honored, as at this moment when we are torn asunder!"

With a sharp cry Cecil sprang to her feet, threw back her head, and to the last day of his life Ronald never forgot the light bursting like a sudden glory through her tears.

"No, Ronald, not that. If my brother's marriage were legal, and his child lives, I can not prove my love and homage by making you master of Middleton Lea. But"—and here the heroine melted into the woman, and proved how one of her brother's poisoned arrows rankled in the wound—"you will not forsake me, Ronald; though I am faded, our love is unfading—we will go together to the New World: that will be our harbor of refuge, there we will love and live and toil together. Did you think I would let you go alone?"

CHAPTER VI.

WHEN Ronald Chester sought Mr. Cathcart he found him in a state of excitement and exasperation wonderful to witness.

"I never," said the worthy lawyer, "met with such an absurd case in all my experience. Chester, I have known you from your boyhood, a capital common-sense fellow, and as honorable as man could be, you surely will exorcise this romantic spirit out of Miss Middleton? Now, don't speak; if that hard-hearted scoundrel her brother had considered his marriage worth a straw, he would not in the first instance have determined to destroy its evidence, knowing the woman would crop up. It was one of those entanglements of which I dare say he had plenty, but which he did not believe in; if he had, the boy—his own boy! but I dare say he did not believe in him either. All I would entreat of Miss Middleton to do, is to let the matter rest. If there is a wife she will be certain to make her appearance; let her bring forward her claim, and then it is for us to dispute it."

"I know Cecil's sense of justice," interrupted Mr. Chester. "If the wife is living, she would, I think, ere this have made a claim. If she does not come forward Miss Middleton will believe she is dead, and will seek the child, of whom she will consider herself the natural as well as the lawful guardian."

"Lawful fiddlestick!" exclaimed the lawyer, thoroughly irritated. "I beg your pardon, my dear Chester, but I can't help it. This is simply a question of law. Of course you can influence Miss Middleton. She has no right to know any thing about that wife and child until a proper claim is made."

"But she does know it," said Mr. Chester, calmly, "and I know her. If she can find that child, and he is legitimate, she will retreat on her five thousand pounds."

"What madness! Give up all claim to that noble property—to what?—to whom? Give up her love for you—"

"No, my good friend, that has nothing to do with property, except the property we have each in the other."

Mr. Cathcart paused and stared at him.

"All I ask is to let time and the law take its course; let Miss Middleton remain as she is; take no steps to discover the child or the woman. Can she not give the law fair play?"

"Cecil does not think of law; she only thinks of justice," said Chester.

"That's an unfair hit," replied Mr. Cathcart; "but I tell you the case will not hold water. She seeks to convert a fiction into a fact. Major Middleton's death has been in all the papers; he has been buried more than a month. If there had been a wife she would have been heard of before now."

"Let us say good-night now, and meet here to-morrow," said Mr. Chester.

"Very good. I need not see Miss Middleton again to-night. Make my respects to her; tell her neither men nor women ever did any good by taking the law into their own hands. All I ask of her is to let matters have their course."

But Cecil would not do that. She would not even go to Middleton Lea until every possible means had been used to trace the woman and child, whom she felt assured had been foully wronged.

If those who do not believe in the nobility of soul that makes man only "a little lower than the angels" could have seen the earnestness with which Ronald Chester entered into Cecil's views and seconded her endeavors to trace the unfortunate woman who, either with or without cause, had been abandoned by the man who had sworn to protect her, they might have been cured of an infidelity which is alike an insult to the created and the creator.

Mr. Cathcart confessed that, insane as they both were, their insanity had done him good.

"My belief, Sir, is," he said, when talking the case over with a professional friend (for it had "oozed out" and become matter of interest, either as something to praise or blame, but at all events something to wonder at and talk about), "my belief, Sir, is that Miss Middleton will have as much happiness in what she considers 'rendering justice' as she would have had in taking possession of Middleton Lea. Now, suppose this child is discovered—which I devoutly hope it never will be—with a dancing or a singing woman for its mother—that exquisite, delicate creature, and that high-hearted man, will set off to the New World, calling themselves (and at their age too, for the lady is past thirty) rich in each other's love. Yes, and believing it, too; believing it, Sir!

"Miss Middleton, Sir, is the victim of the wildest dream of justice that ever disturbed a woman's brain! All I entreated of her was to wait until the wife made a claim. It is not one woman in ten who understands reason; but what makes the matter more aggravating is, Miss Middleton does—on every subject but this. I am very glad that such justice is not contagious, for if it was," concluded Mr. Cathcart, taking off his spectacles, and speaking in a confidential low tone to his friend, "as Ronald had the truthful impudence to tell me, there would be an end to law. However, Sir, for all that (this is strictly between you and me), it does one good to see that noble woman's disinterestedness, and know that it is real and true. It is more refreshing than a cruise to Norway in the long vacation! Selfishness, Sir, is the curse of this age of electro-plate and stucco, and yet here, Sir, are a full-grown man and woman who have no idea of the sensation!"

Certainly Mr. Cathcart had never so unwillingly placed himself in communication with the police as he presently proceeded to do. Cecil, not satisfied with what she believed would be the coldness of his instructions, saw the detective officer who was to be employed in this delicate investigation, and quickened his perceptions with the hope of a handsome reward if he succeeded. Of course she was beset with friends and advisers, who held with Mr. Cathcart that it would have been wiser to have taken possession and waited. It was astonishing how all degrees of "friendliness" encircled the heiress and her betrothed—every suggestion being "for her good." She listened with the calm and gentle courtesy inseparable from her nature, but remained firm and faithful to what she considered justice.

CHAPTER VII.

HOURS and days passed anxiously and heavily, bringing hardly any information from the detective officer who accompanied the lawyer's clerk in the search which Cecil had so promptly determined upon. One week they were in Scotland; next week they were drifting from one to another of the Channel Islands, after what seemed to all but Cecil a forlorn hope. Yet the fact of the marriage, and the fact that a child was born, seemed established—to the great disgust of Mr. Cathcart. A clew gathered up in Guernsey sent the two men to Baden-Baden, whence a strange wild story was transmitted to their employers. This story was to the effect that, at what they called "a grand hotel," Major Middleton's last visit was perfectly remembered. He was accompanied by a delicate blue-eyed blonde, as tiny and fantastic as a fairy, and who sang like an angel; but who, one night after a concert, disappeared with a Russian tenor, who married her next morning. This did not disconcert the major in the least; during the whole of the following day he was the gayest of the gay at all the places and patronized the Russian tenor's next concert in a very liberal manner. He had created too marked a reputation for eccentricity during former seasons to admit of the possibility of a mistake as to his identity.

The beautiful blonde (thus the story ran on) had made a confidante of the lady who sat at "the receipt of custom" at the hotel, and had assured her that, even if he had been a free man, nothing would have induced her to marry "cette sauvage magnifique, Major Middleton." She had made that little excursion with him from sheer pity. "Madame Middleton," whom she described as being fierce as "Vesuvius," "dark as night," and in bad health, had altogether made life so triste for the poor major, that in pity she gave him a little variety, but to marry him!—it would have been too absurd—"he had not a note in his voice!" Of course inquiry was made if this person had stated where "Madame Middleton" was? Somewhere in Scotland, the signora had said. The officer had been there; had traced the bride and bridegroom to Oban and into the wilds of Arasaig, where the latter had established renown as a fisherman and cragsman, daring and doing what the Highlanders could not achieve. Cecil's cheek paled, and her tears fell at the record of her brother's vices; but her eyes brightened when she found his feats of courage and strength unforgotten.

The lady's beauty was also well remembered, and even in those early days of wedlock, the mistress of the hotel at Oban had observed, that "they were not that loving together as might have been expected, seeing they were just wed. The lady, 'a foreigner, poor body,' cried a deal, and the gentleman never heeded. She was 'awsome' too, sometimes, in her tempers, and she" (the landlady) "was sorry for baith." It would seem that Major Middleton soon wearied of his wedded life, for the next time he was traced—there were now no footprints of his wife—he reappeared at Baden. It was evident that he had left the lady he had married, and that he had conceived a violent hatred toward her. One of the major's brother officers, hearing of the investigation, called on Mr. Cathcart, and suggested that perhaps she might be discovered in a lunatic asylum, for the major once, and once only, had mentioned to him what he called his "miserable marriage" (they had been close comrades as brothers during the Crimean war), and had distinctly stated that she was insane. "But surely," Cecil said, "if that were the case, there would have been some trace of the fact—she must have been paid for in some asylum. And the child! Her brother could not have left his own child without provision.

Instead of enlightening this communication perplexed even the keen-witted lawyer. So confident did Cecil become that both mother and child were alive that she prepared for her intended emigration, making all necessary arrangements for the well-doing of Middleton Lea—as though she were its agent, not its owner. Gradually her friendly advisers dropped into mere acquaintances—hardly that. She had cast herself from her high estate by her own act, and out of the established mode and circle of her race. She was monstrously eccentric. Some whose advice had failed to make an impression on her considered her conduct as an unmarried lady highly indelicate.

Then Mr. Chester's friends gradually cooled down to nodding and "how-d'ye-doing," and in course of time became near-sighted when they met him. Some declared they thought a man little better than "a fool" who could not manage to make a woman who loved him do any thing he pleased; others sneered at the poor-spirited idea of giving up such a place as Middleton Lea! when any fellow with common-sense could have "turned the wind." A few above the common herd understood and appreciated Cecil's justice, and respected Chester for the freedom of heart and conduct he awarded to his betrothed. His independent spirit yearned to be the architect of its own fortune, and he would have accepted hers only because he could not have had her without it. There are some such nobly loving hearts still in the world, thank God!

Mr. Cathcart at length declared that every thing had been done that could be done; that every stone had been turned that could be turned, except one: an advertisement for the missing ones might be inserted in the newspapers; but Cecil shrank from that, it was such an exposure of her brother's vices, such a reflection on her brother's memory. She dwelt with intense pain on what she felt to be a thousand times worse than the suffering her brother's selfishness and caprices had obliged her to endure—the heartlessness and cruelty of thus abandoning his wife and child. His hardness, his tyranny, his bitter taunts were all buried with him; but this living proof of a thoroughly heartless nature wounded her beyond endurance and ate into her heart.

CHAPTER VIII.

Winter was

"Lingering in the lap of May."

Cecil believed as firmly as ever that her brother's wife and child would be discovered, and as firmly as ever refused to assume a position to which she had no claim. Time was passing, and Ronald Chester must either go abroad or relinquish the prospect that promised brightly for the future.

It was noon, the noon of what would be a long, sunless day, calling but faint odors from the early flowers; the wind wavering between east and west; little gray clouds drifting beneath a hazy sky.

Cecil's first act when she entered the library was to shut down the window, and, though the room was due south, to draw up the blind. There was no sun to exclude. The fatal ebony desk stood in its old place. She drew a chair to the table, arranged paper and envelopes, and sat, pen in hand, not writing, but looking upward as if awaiting help to arrange and express her thoughts.

Suddenly her reverie was broken by a knock at the door. South, her old, faithful servant, in answer to his mistress's "Come in," entered, and, white and trembling, advanced to the table and grasped the back of a chair with both hands, looking earnestly at her.

"What is it, South? Why do you not speak?"

"In a minute, Miss Cecil. Just one minute to get my breath and set how to begin. I don't see how to believe my eyes or ears. I wish Mr. Chester was on the spot; and Mr. Cathcart says to me, as if I did not know it, 'Miss Middleton is an angel,' he says; 'only she shouldn't go against the nature of things, South, he says—'"

"Never mind what Mr. Cathcart said, South; that can not have agitated you."

"No, Miss Cecil; but he's below. He is in my pantry this blessed minute. I know he is; for he has as many turns in him as an eel; so, to make sure, I locked him in, and there's the key," added South, triumphantly. "The scamp!"

"Are you in your senses, South? Are you speaking of Mr. Cathcart?"

"No, ma'am; but my brain is moydered, and no wonder. It's that scamp of the world, Charles, Miss Cecil—Charles—Charley Dacre, that dared to say I was jealous of him—Charles, that knew all the ins and outs, the bads and goods, of him that's gone, that I told you was sent to America—the poor Master's pad-groom; and sure, if he had a mind to come from the bottom of the sea, where so many honest boys are drowned, he might have done it at once, and spared us all the trouble and bother we've had—not to count the expense, and keeping you out of your rights. I never was glad to set eyes on Charley Dacre before; but the minute I saw him I thought what was on the road, and that we should get the rights of every thing at last. There's hardly an ounce of flesh on his bones, nor yet a decent rag on his back, and he says he hasn't as much as would bury him!"

"South," exclaimed Cecil, breathlessly, rising from her chair, "I do not care to hear that; I want to hear about my brother's wife; he was present at the marriage?"

"He was, Miss, and at something else, too; only sit down, dear mistress, till I get out what—May I be forgiven for it, I'm a proud man to have heard! He was present at the poor lady's funeral, and what's more, he saw the last of the child, which died before its mother; and the mother never riz her head after that, nor, says Charley Dacre, went into tantrums nor desperation, but settled into melancholy madness, and the major put her into a lunatic asylum, and paid for her handsomely, though he would never see her after the birth of the baby, which he disowned. And when she died she was buried with her child. Oh, Miss Cecil! sure it's not fainting you are?"

Cecil did not faint. She told South to get her a glass of water, and not speak again for a few minutes. When he left the room her trembling heart echoed her murmured thanksgiving:

"Lord, I thank thee that my brother's memory is purified from the great sin that was pressing me into my grave!"

In less than two hours Charles Dacre was beneath the harrow of Mr. Cathcart's cross-examination, and the same evening the clear-headed old lawyer journeyed only a few miles out of London, to the asylum where the poor lady died, and to the church-yard where she had been buried in the same grave with her child. It is one of the unexplained readings of corrupt nature that the men who are most zealous and indefatigable in the destruction of female virtue are always the most violent against the woman whom they suspect of infidelity to themselves. Whatever cause produced Major Middleton's hatred of the woman whom he loved after his fashion well enough to marry, never came to light.

Dacre, when questioned on the point, only answered that Major Middleton was a very particular gentleman—very particular—especially when he began to get a little tired of a lady. But Mrs. Middleton was a foreigner, and as fond of liberty as the major himself, and very "wild-like" from first to last. He never knew who she was, or where she came from. Master seemed to think a great deal of her at first, and at one time told him their next move should be to Middleton Lea; but they soon got to be very unhappy. She was the only lady his master was ever afraid of. He used to swear she was mad; and so she was (Dacre thought) from the very first, off and on. Mr. Cathcart repeated this to Cecil, who entreated that no more questions should be asked. All that was necessary to be known was known. Her brother had not deserted either wife or child, and the past should be buried with them. It was as dishonorable to pry into the secrets of the dead as of the living. Dacre should have a sum of money to enable him to go where he pleased, and she—they—would take possession of Middleton Lea after their marriage; that is, when they returned from their wedding tour.

The worthy lawyer astonished South by rushing into the dining-room and shaking him by the hand; "as cordially," said South, when he repeated it in the pride of his heart, "as if I was a gentleman!"

"South," said Mr. Cathcart, "I look upon a faithful servant as a family friend, and you have been in the family twenty years. My blood boils when I think of the wicked cruelty that obliged her to see those letters."

"He could not help it, Sir," said South, "no more than a cat can help torturing before it destroys. To think of them two being children of the same parents, Sir!"

"And to think now of her and her husband's long-deferred happiness, South. Heaven bless them both! Nevertheless, a word in your ear, South." The lawyer's eyes twinkled as he whispered it. "I hope I shall never have in my office, as long as I live and stick to business, another case of Woman's Justice, South!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Did you ever chance to spend any portion of your summer rusticating-time under the same roof with a youthful victim of Trout-fishing fever? Perhaps not; and then you can not be familiar with all the phases of this disease. It is a contagious epidemic, though not of the malignant class. It makes its appearance early in the season, and spreads with fearful rapidity in the vicinity of ponds and running brooks. Ladies rarely suffer from its visitations; its most numerous victims are boys and young men, although violent cases have occurred among those on the shady side of fifty; and even boy babies have shown marked indications of the disease. The most prominent symptoms of Trout-fishing fever, as exhibited in a boy of from ten to fourteen, are great restlessness and excitement at the mere mention of a brook or pond; and the sight of such bodies of water throws him into violent fits, analogous to, though not as distressing to witness, as those experienced by the victim of hydrophobia. He jumps wildly about, dances and screams, and no relief is obtained until he is allowed to dip a line attached to a long pole into the water. Even then the spasm occurs every time the line is taken out of the water for an instant; and sometimes it is necessary to apply the remedy many hours before the mind is restored to a tranquil state. Various other symptoms are apparent. The patient has no inclination for ordinary sports and games; he spends much time alone in fondling over fish-hooks, lines, and poles; he eschews meat, and has no appetite for any thing save trout. Nevertheless, he is not morose or selfish; on the contrary, he is remarkably kind and obliging. He asks if you have errands to do; he forestalls your wishes; he is solicitous for your health; and then he mildly inquires what will be the probable state of the weather on some succeeding day. By that you know at once that a fit is approaching; and so strong is this disease that when a crisis is at hand it is considered safer to seek the nearest suitable waters and allow the disordered nerves and muscles full play. So when he hints at a fishing excursion you regard it as a remedial agency, and make no objection.

At least, we did not object when the boy we have in mind asked us. We went with him to be on hand in case of dangerous paroxysms. We went once, twice, many times—often finding trout, and always finding pleasure. Short excursions were rather disdained by our young patient; so one afternoon, about the time country people sit down to the tea-table, we entered a lumbering old stage-coach bound far into the interior of Maine, accompanied by all manner of fishing-traps. A very jolly ride we had, part by sunlight, part by moonlight, and as no other passengers came within the coach, we appropriated all the conveniences it contained. To be sure the roads were fearfully rough; but then the views were bold and grand, and we were going a-trouting. So we laughed, and sung, and planned for the morrow. We had intended to go to the foot of Old Blue, a somewhat noted mountain, nearly 3000 feet high; but when we reached the nearest approach to it on the stage-route, we found no conveyance could be furnished on the next day. So we went on to the little village of P——, where we found excellent accommodations for the night at the hotel.

Next morning our landlord assured us trouting was not so good at Old Blue as a few miles in the opposite direction. So, breakfast over, with a sociable driver and a stout horse and wagon we started for Gold Stream, where, years ago, before it had been christened, many adventurers flocked to search for gold, though few found it. The drive was charming, and the scenery grand. A long ridge of lofty mountains encircled us, and brooks, and streams, and ponds sparkled with the full waters which a shower of the previous day had given. Our guide was chatty, and gave many an anecdote and bit of information. He took special pride in telling of the nine-pounder trout, caught by a New York gentleman a year or two ago in Rangely Lake, which was only about eighteen miles from where we were. This trout was carried to New York in a tank of water, various contrivances being made for its safety and comfort. It was a difficult and expensive undertaking, and when accomplished, the poor thing pined for its native waters and died in a week. In the course of our drive we rode through the bed of the famous "Runaway Pond." The story in brief is this: Nearly a quarter of a century ago this pond was a deep body of water, famed for its trout. Near by ran a stream on which was a valuable saw-mill. One day some mischievous youths cut a deep channel in the bank of the pond toward the mill-stream. The waters, rushing into it, forced their way resistlessly until they cut entirely through into the stream. The whole pond pressed into the channel with amazing force and rapidity, and speedily all the waters had flowed into the mill-stream, producing an immense freshet, destroying the mill, and raising all connecting streams of water in a remarkable manner. Such is popular history of "Runaway Pond." Now a deep, sandy bed, encircled by high banks, is pointed out to the stranger, and furnishes the only obvious proofs of the truth of the story.

But dallying with the scenery, we are forgetting the trout. It is just as well, however, for Gold Stream was so high that morning, in consequence of the shower, that trout would not "bite." So, after reconnoitring the premises, with a view to a future trip, we returned to P—— to dine and rest. The latter part of the afternoon, however, when the waters had fallen somewhat, we went a few miles in another direction, to Dill's Brook, where the trout did bite, to their sorrow, but to our patient's great delight. The streams in this vicinity, as well as Rangely Lake, farther up the country, are very popular, and strangers from all parts of the country patronize them. But truth compels us to say that the waters are not healing—our patient is no better, and there is little hope of improvement until cold winter weather comes.

From the South come good reports respecting the cotton crops. A good deal of research has been made, and the result is encouraging. The crop is estimated at about three millions of bales.

Times have changed, and we have changed with them. One hundred years ago a good deacon of New Haven carried an umbrella to church (the first one seen in that place), and a deputation of the brethren were sent to "labor" with him, inasmuch as the use of an umbrella when it rained was thought to be "flying in the face of Providence."

The "big snake" of Tennessee has been almost caught! but, alas for the peace of the community, he has escaped, and is again at large. A trap had been set for him, consisting of an immense box, with its open end placed against the mouth of the hole into which his snakeship retired. He was seen—at least his head was—going into the trap; but the beholder was so terrified that he rushed away at full speed. The next person who ventured near the trap found it lying with one end still in the hole, but the other riven as if struck by lightning, some of the bars of iron being found fully fifty steps off. No one supposed for a moment he would be able to break the immense cage prepared for him: it would have held a lion. So says the Nashville Banner. Latest intelligence.—The snake has at length been shot by a couple of young men! He measured 29⅜ feet in length, and his greatest circumference was 30⅜ inches. He was spotted like a rattlesnake, and a terrible-looking fellow.

The Water Company in Portland are rapidly progressing with their work, and the water from Sebago Lake will be brought into the city by December—a matter of rejoicing to all residents. The main conduit will be six miles in length, and over six thousand feet are already laid. The pipe is shipped from Philadelphia; three cargoes have been received, and the fourth probably will arrive before this paragraph is read. The Company have decided to lay a large brick conduit at the lake end instead of pipe, so that the future wants of the city may be secured. From three to five hundred feet of pipe are laid daily, and every thing possible done to accelerate the enterprise. It is said that the water of Sebago Lake has been proved, by analysis, to be the purest in the known world—only one grain of solid matter being found in fifty-eight thousand grains of water. It can be used for all purposes without distillation.

A Chicago damsel has been brought into court on charge of disorderly conduct. In fact, in a fit of passion because her lover would not have his imperial shaved off to please her, she snatched up a pair of scissors and cut it off herself! The unfortunate man has been suffering for some time under her threat to sue him for breach of promise. He was engaged to her, it was true, but he had mistaken his affections. Nevertheless if he was absent from her for two days there came a note:

"Darling,—If I do not see you in two hours I shall commence the suit. Thy adoring Marion."

Naturally he went. If she wished to go to a concert, and he did not profess a willingness to escort her, there came a note:

"My Own,—The papers are in the hands of a lawyer. "Faithfully yours."

When the climax of cutting his imperial came, he brought a charge against her. The Judge fined the parties $10 each.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, which recently held a Convention in this city, is a charitable organization of Israelites, founded in 1843. This Order is a secret society similar to the Odd Fellows, or Free Masons, but none except Hebrews can become members. Yet it does not pretend to have any special religious purposes, only "to alleviate the wants of the poor and needy, to visit and attend the sick, and to protect and assist the widow and orphan." The Order is divided into 115 lodges, including over 12,000 members. These lodges are organized into five districts, which embrace every State in the Union. It is stated that a great deal in the way of charitable enterprises has been accomplished by the Order of B'nai B'rith.

HON. JAMES BROOKS, OF NEW YORK.

James Brooks was born at Portland, Maine, in 1810. His father was captain and principal owner of a brig in the merchant service. This vessel was lost at sea, and all on board perished. In it was invested all the property of the captain, and his wife was left a widow with three young children—James, the eldest, being less than ten years old. When he reached the age of eleven he was thought capable of earning his own livelihood. He found employment as clerk in a "store" at Lewiston, the agreement being that he should be "kept"—that is, have his board and clothes—until he was twenty-one, and at the end of his term should receive a hogshead of New England rum. Now it happened that Mr. Reynolds, the keeper of that store—for it will be seen that there was another store in Lewiston—besides the multifarious matters that then formed part of the stock in trade of a country store, was the custodian of the town library, which contained, besides a few books on science, Rollin's Ancient History, Goldsmith's Natural History, and the like, one of Scott's novels. Over all these the lad—future editor and Congressman—pored assiduously for two years, getting by heart the novel. At the end of two years young Brooks asked Reynolds to release him from his ten years' contract. The request was granted. The fact was that the sharp lad had a better offer from Mr. Lowel, the keeper of the other Lewiston store. Lowel would give him three months' schooling every year; he should also have the privilege of selling candies upon his own account, and for his own profit. Besides—for Lowel kept a tannery as well as a store—young Brooks might buy raw skins, have them tanned free of charge, and sell the leather for his own profit. So, by one means and another, Brooks made and saved some money. Meanwhile he grew ambitious. He wanted to get an "education." This, in the New England phrase of forty years ago, meant going to college. The lad kept a sort of journal, in which he wrote down, day by day, all his wishes and hopes. This he kept in his desk; but somehow it fell into the hands of good Mr. Lowel. That worthy man saw that in his young clerk there was the making of something more than a dealer in candies and calicoes. He told the boy that he would release him from the contract to remain with him until he was of age; and would, moreover, if necessary, help him to "get an education."

Young Brooks's small savings now stood him in good stead. He had accumulated enough to pay for tuition at Monmouth Academy, besides the charge of a dollar a week for board. After a time he returned to Lewiston, and undertook to teach the district school for ten dollars a month and his board. It was the custom to put up at auction the school-teacher for board, he to be knocked down to the lowest bidder. Brooks was started at a dollar and forty cents a week. But competition was brisk, and the bids ran rapidly down to a dollar, seventy-five cents, fifty cents, and at last, when they reached forty cents a week, the auctioneer's hammer fell, and the teacher was knocked down to a jolly farmer, who looked as though he did not live upon four dimes a week.

"Come, young man," said he, jovially, as they mounted the wagon, "cheer up: let me tell you, a good deal of good eating can be got out of forty cents a week, as you will find out at my house."

Reaching the farm-house, he was ushered into his apartment, which certainly was not at all like the dormitory at Squeers's. Next morning the farmer undertook to demonstrate how he could make money by boarding the teacher well for forty cents a week. He led him to the pig-sty, where a fat porker was poking his nose into the trough so lazily that it was clear that he did not suffer from short commons.

"Do you see that critter? How much do you guess he will cut up?"

Brooks, who had bought many a porker while a clerk, made a very close estimate.

"That's about the mark," said the farmer, with evidently rising admiration. "Now you're a-going to eat him, among other things; and I guess you'll have hard work to eat all your share of him this winter. I saw you looked down in the mouth when you was knocked off to me for forty cents a week; but I'll show you how I can keep you for that, and make money by it too."

He went on to explain that his farm produced almost every thing needed for the family use, with a surplus which was traded off at the store for groceries and the like. The farmer had little use for money, except to pay the taxes; and to produce this tax-money was the destination of the porker. "Now, you see, if I hadn't got you I should have had to kill the hog, take him to Portland, and sell him. This would have taken me and the team three days; and when I got back, besides losing time and trouble, I shouldn't have had more money than I shall get for you. Now all you'll eat won't be more than the whole of that hog. Call that square. Besides, you're a smart young fellow, and can teach the girls their lessons evenings. That 'll be clear profit. So I shall get my money's worth out of you, don't you fear. Come along and see if I can't do this, and not starve you either."

That winter was a pleasant and profitable one for the young teacher. He taught and went through the studies preparatory for college; and one evening in a week read aloud the newspaper to his host, and thus really began his training for his future profession of journalist and politician.

In the spring he found himself "ready for college," with sufficient money, added to what he could earn in vacations, to pay his expenses in a frugal way. He, in fact, kept at the head of his class; so that when his Sophomore year should have begun he asked to be examined for admission to the Junior class. The request was rather reluctantly acceded to; but the examination was satisfactory, and he was admitted to the Junior class, so that his course at Waterville College lasted three years instead of the regular four.

Having graduated at eighteen, second in his class, he returned to his mother's at Portland, having just ninety cents in his pocket. He must find something to do at once. A man who can do any thing that needs to be done need hardly look for work. A teacher was wanted for a Latin school in Portland. BROOKS gained the appointment, with a salary of five hundred dollars—a fair income then and there for a young man. Besides teaching he began the study of law, entering the office of JOHN NEAL, a man not unknown to fame as lawyer and author.

During his last year at college he had begun to write for the local newspapers—without pay, of course. The Portland Advertiser was then the leading newspaper of Maine. BROOKS began to send anonymous papers to this journal. The editor soon found that these articles were the most attractive things in his paper. He sought out his anonymous contributor, and engaged him to write regularly at a salary of five hundred dollars. For two years BROOKS kept up his threefold occupation of teacher, law student, and journalist. But the last, as almost always happens, at length absorbed him wholly, and he gave all his time to the Advertiser, saying that he also took up the kindred function of political speaker. He became popular at once, and in his twenty-first year was elected member of the State Legislature from his native city of Portland—still, however, keeping up his connection with the newspaper, for which, next year, he went to Washington as its correspondent from the capital and the South. His Southern letters were noted for their strenuous opposition to the system of slavery. Thence he went to Europe as correspondent, traveling on foot and describing what he saw.

Returning to America he received propositions to undertake the establishment of a daily newspaper, to be called the New York Express—BROOKS to furnish brains, and others cash. Before the engagement was consummated he was nominated as Member of Congress from the Portland district. He preferred Congress to the Express. The district was then strongly Democratic, while BROOKS was a Whig. There were three candidates—BROOKS, SMITH, and DUN. Two trials were made, neither candidate having a majority. On the third DUN withdrew, and F. O. J. SMITH was elected by a close vote.

The Express enterprise was then resumed, and the paper was started. But the men who had undertaken to furnish the capital failed to meet their engagement, and the whole burden fell upon BROOKS. The editor-in-chief undertook and performed the work of three men. Finally, the Express having been united with another paper, it gained a firm footing. BROOKS, who had been elected to the New York Legislature, also became one of the most popular stump speakers during the HARRISON campaign for the Presidency. In 1847 he married a lady of Virginia who was the owner of a few slaves, but the bridegroom insisted that these should be manumitted before the marriage took place.

In 1849 he was elected Member of Congress; and was re-elected in 1851. In 1853 he returned to the active management of the Express, making, however, another extended tour in Europe.

Of his more recent political course we give only the bare outline. When the election for the Thirty-eighth Congress approached the country was convulsed with the war excitement. BROOKS, who had all along belonged to the Whig party, refused to go with its successor, the Republican party, and presenting himself as an independent candidate for Congress, was elected—the Democratic candidate retiring in his favor. He ran for the Thirty-ninth Congress, received the certificate of election, and took his seat. This was contested by his Republican opponent, in whose favor the case was decided by the House near the close of the session. He was nominated for the next Congress, and elected by a large and undisputed majority. He took his seat, singularly enough protesting against the constitutionality of the House. He must now be considered as the undisputed leader of the Democratic party in the House of Representatives.

POLAR BEAR HUNTING.

THE Polar Bear is the largest, strongest, most powerful, and, next to the grizzly, the most ferocious of the five species. Its distinguishing characteristics are, great length of body and neck, the smallness of its ears, largeness of the soles of its feet, fineness and length of hair, and the narrowness of the head. It is invariably of a dingy white hue. Some have been seen which were eight feet long, and others have been captured which weighed 1500 pounds. Their size and strength and ferocity make them very dangerous to hunt, and the chase of them, by the Esquimaux and others, with dogs, and armed with lances or pikes, as in our illustration, is full of excitement and incident.

THE LATE EMANUEL LEUTZE.

LEUTZE, the artist, died of sun-stroke in Washington City on July 18, aged 52 years. His great ability as an artist had long been recognized, and he had for many years ranked among the first of American painters.

He was a native of Germany, but his parents brought him to this country when he was in his infancy, and settled at Philadelphia. His first efforts at drawing were made while at the sick bed of his father, and the pencil was originally taken up merely to beguile the time. His first real success in painting was made in 1840, with his "Indian Gazing at the Setting Sun." He made considerable money off this and a few other works, which had been ordered on the heels of his success, and in 1841 he carried out his long projected design of going to Dusseldorf to study under Karl Lessing, then the chief of the Dusseldorf School of Art, and from whom Leutze adopted the style of hard outline and defective coloring peculiar to the school, and which a subsequent residence of study at Venice in a school of art distinguished for its voluptuousness of color could not wholly eradicate. He remained in Europe, engaged in painting, until 1859, when he returned to this country.

His first work in Europe, "Columbus before the Council of Salamanca," was purchased by the Dusseldorf Art Union; as was also a subsequent work representing Columbus in chains. The latter was subsequently brought to this country.

The best known of Leutze's pictures are those illustrating American history, and the large painting in the Capitol, entitled, "Westward the Course of Empire takes its Way." His "Washington Crossing the Delaware" has been frequently engraved, and is familiar to every school-boy. "Washington at Monmouth," "News from Lexington," "Sergeant Jasper," and "Washington at Princeton," are among his most popular works.

A LOBSTER FACTORY.

We lately gave an account in the Weekly of a New Jersey Fish Farm, "showing how trout were "manufactured" for market. We present our readers in this issue with an illustrated account of one of the many lobster factories which are to be found on the Atlantic coast of Maine. The particular establishment herein described is at Oceanville, Deer Island, in Isle Haut Bay; and the account and illustrations will indicate pretty clearly to the reader the modus operandi of catching and preparing this most important of the very extensive shell-fish family for market.

Lobsters are found in almost all the salt waters of the globe; but, like many other fish, they thrive better in, and are the finest flavored when taken out of, the waters of the more northern latitudes. The name of the animal is derived from a word signifying leaper, and was doubtless suggested by the manner in which it moves through the water by short leaps. It swims backward, its propelling power being in the tail, which it draws by a quick, forcible motion toward its body. It has no difficulty in directing its course accurately, as its eyes project from the head, and can be freely turned so as to see backward as well as in front. Lobsters go in schools, having male leaders which are the largest and strongest of the school, and which maintain their supremacy by superior force. The older leaders when taken are often found to be covered with scars received from frequent and fierce conflicts for the championship. The lobster casts his shell annually, retiring for a short time to some sheltered place until the new shell hardens sufficiently to allow it to leave its retreat. During this time (May to June and July) it is said to be "sick," and is unfit for market. While "sick" it is very liable to be attacked by other fish; and when it is at all incautious and voluntersome is not unfrequently slowly devoured, inch by inch, by worms, crabs, and even fellow-lobsters. Its claws are possessed of immense power, and these it uses to crush its enemies, and to prepare and hold its food. When wounded in these useful members it casts them off almost instantly, detaching them at the joint, and in a short time new ones sprout out and take the place of the old ones, so that it is not uncommon to find a very large lobster with claws not over an inch in length, or with only one.

The "ova," or spawn, of the lobster are beads of a brilliant red when boiled, and are carried under the tail of the female, which is always called a "hen" lobster. The spawn is familiarly spoken of as the "coral," and is used in making lobster sauce, to give it that pink, inviting appearance which epicures esteem a sine qua non in its preparation for the table. Lobsters, until boiled, are of a beautiful blue-black hue, which turns, as is well known, to a brilliant scarlet in boiling water. The "hen," or female lobster, is broader in the tail part than the "cock" lobster, and she is more prized on account, as above mentioned, of her furnishing gourmands with the coloring matter to the sauce which accompanies their salmon or turbot.

The lobster can be magnetized, and it is a feat frequently performed by old sailors for the edification and astonishment of the verdant. This is accomplished by gently stroking the lobster from the head to the tail with the hand, when it becomes passive, and, if stood on its head, will remain so for some minutes motionless with its tail in the air.

The fishing season begins as soon as the lobster has left his "sick bed," and, with his new shell, put on new vigor. The fishermen then flock to the lobster-grounds in Penobscot Bay and put down their traps by thousands. The usual method of taking them is by using peculiarly shaped nets called "pots," which are, in fact, a sort of basket-stretched on hoops and covered over with netting. In the netting a circular hole is made for the ingress of the lobster (on the same principle as that in a wire mouse-trap), so that, having once found his way into the net, the imprisoned shell-fish is unable to recede. These "pots" are baited with dead fish or offal. Fish, however, are always to be preferred, and the fresher the better, as lobsters are choice in this respect, and will often decline to be enticed by a stale bait. The "pots" are sunk by means of heavy stones fastened to them, and these ropes attach the "pots" to a line of floating corks on the surface of the water. They are sunk just below low-water-mark, as lobsters never travel far from the inshore rocks, which furnish them with their food. As the tide flows in the lobsters creep in with it, nearer and nearer to the shore, in search of food, and are then attracted by the sight or smell of the bait in the "pots" set to catch them. All sea-fish feed on the flood-tide, and hence, as soon as the ebb has turned, and the tide begins to flow inward, there is a general bustle and stir among the inhabitants of the salt water.

A trap is estimated to average a catch of two lobsters a day through the season; and when it is considered that the lobster-grounds of Maine furnish at a moderate estimate sixty thousand lobsters a day, some idea of the extent of the business may be realized. Nearly all the lobsters which are sold fresh in the Boston and New York markets are taken from these grounds, being transported in smacks or small vessels having wells or spaces in their holds which allow a constant flow of water through them. This is necessary, as the lobster soon dies if the water becomes foul.

But the larger portion of the catch is put into cans and hermetically sealed, and in this form goes to all portions of the globe, civilized and uncivilized. When caught the lobsters are "lightened" and "carred" by the fishermen—that is, small plugs are inserted between the joints of the claws so that the lobsters can not open them to crush their neighbors; and they are put into large racks called "cars," and moored in clear water.

From the "cars" the lobsters which are intended for packing are conveyed aboard to the boiling-room of the factory and placed in kettles alive, great care being taken to discard all lobsters which do not exhibit signs of vitality, it being a point with first-class establishments never to boil a lobster after it is dead, although it may have been dead but a few minutes. After being boiled in sea-water for a short time they are piled in racks to cool, after which they are "cracked," and the meat of the large claws, tail, and arms connecting the claws with the body, removed by men and girls. The meat then passes into the "filling-room," where the black string of the tail and the bone of the claws are removed. The meat is then washed and placed in the cans by girls, after which it is sauced and carefully weighed, the cans put in, and the cans passed to the solderers, who solder in the covers with the greatest dispatch. The cans are then taken to the "bath-room" and placed in square pans holding each about one hundred one-pound cans. These pans when full are placed in large tanks of boiling water and boiled until the air in the cans has expanded so as to cause the ends to bulge out, when they are punctured and the air allowed to escape. The hole is then immediately stopped with a drop of solder, and they are replaced in the bath to complete the process. With the greatest care some cans will leak, and in the best establishments these are thrown out or opened and refilled with fresh meat, as a "third run" (or third bath) greatly injures the quality of the meat. After the bath the cans are removed to the "labeling-room," where, after cooling and the ends collapsing, they are inspected by sounding each can with a bit of iron to ascertain if the exhaust is perfect. This done, and imperfect cans removed, they are scoured in saw-dust by girls and then painted, as they would otherwise rust on long voyages. When dry they are labeled and packed in wooden boxes containing from two to four dozen cans each, and after being properly stenciled are ready for shipment.

HAULING THE LOBSTER "POTS."

In the establishment at Oceanville, where is packed a famous lobster known the world over as the "star lobster," and which is conducted by the Portland Packing Company (said to be the largest packing establishment in the world, carrying on nine different establishments), about three thousand cans per day are turned out, requiring about five thousand lobsters to fill them. The lobsters go into the cans in a perfectly fresh state; and years after, when opened, are found to be as fresh as when just taken from the shell, and far superior to many of the lobsters which are sold in the shell in our markets, and cheaper—the cost of transporting alive more than counterbalancing the cost of cans and sealing.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

A new champion for the Intelligence of Animals, M. Ernest Menault, has revived the discussion in a book full of facts and inferences which, if not all new, are all to the point. Without admitting that humans are the issue of quadrumans, he believes with Lactantius that animals possess in a certain measure the faculties of men, and that our inferior brethren, as St. Francis d'Assisi calls them, preceded us on earth, and were our first instructors. We take an example or two of what the smallest and the dullest of them, as well as the biggest and cleverest—fleas and fish as well as elephants—can do.

There were Industrious Fleas before our time. Baron Walckenaer (who died in 1852) saw with his own eyes, for instance, in the Place de la Bourse, Paris, four learned fleas perform the manual exercise, standing upright on their hind legs, with a splinter of wood to serve for a pike. Two other fleas dragged a golden carriage; with a third flea, holding a whip, on the box for coachman. Another pair dragged a cannon. The flea-horses were harnessed by a golden chain fastened to their hind legs, which were never taken off. They had lived in this way two years and a half, without any mortality among them, when Walckenaer saw them. They took their meals on their keeper's arm. Their feats were performed on a plate of polished glass. When they were sulky, and refused to work, the man, instead of whipping them, held a bit of lighted charcoal over their backs, which very soon brought them to their senses.

But of what use is cleverness without a heart? The flea has strong maternal affections. She lays her eggs in the crannies of floors, in the bedding of animals, and on babies' night-clothes. When the helpless, transparent larvæ appear, the mother-flea feels them, as the dove does its young, by discharging into their mouths the contents of her stomach. Grudge her not, therefore, one small drop of blood. For you, it is nothing but a flea-bite; for her, it is the life of her beloved offspring!

While pleading, however, for the flea we can not do as much for the bug, though he is gifted with fuller developed intelligence. An inquisitive gentleman, wishing to know how the bug became aware of a human presence, tried the following experiment. He got into a bed suspended from the ceiling, without any tester, in the middle of an unfurnished room. He then placed on the floor a bug, who, guided probably by smell, pondered the means of reaching the bed. After deep reflection he climbed up the wall, traveled straight across the ceiling to the spot immediately over the bed, and then dropped plump on the observer's nose. Was this, or was it not, an act of intelligence?

The Fish belongs to the great Flatbelli family. The same sort of platitude which you see in his person doubtless extends to the texture of his character. You have met him somewhere in human shape—one of those pale-faced, wishy-washy gentlemen, whose passions have extinguished all heart and feeling. You often find them in diplomatic regions, and can't tell whether they are fish or flesh. But if their mental powers are less developed, their term of existence is more extended. They gain in longevity what they lose in warmth of temperament.

Nevertheless, the skill with which the stickleback constructs his nest is never surpassed in natural history. Other fishes display an address which we acquire only by long and constant practice. One fellow, with a mouth contracted into a long narrow tube (which he uses as a popgun), prowls about the banks of tidal rivers. On spying a fly on the water-weeds he lies perfectly still till he gets within five or six feet of it. He then shoots it with water from his proboscis, never failing to bring down his prize. A governor of the hospital at Batavia, doubting the fact, though attested by credible witnesses, procured some of these fish, to watch their practice. He stuck a fly on a pin at the end of a stick, and placed it so as to attract their notice. To his great delight he shot it with their water-gun—for which he rewarded them with a treat of insects.

The pike has proved himself not only intelligent, but even capable—disbelieve it who will—of gratitude.

"While living at Durham," says Dr. Warwick, "I took a walk one evening in Lord Stamford's park. On reaching a pond in which fish were kept ready for use, I observed a fine pike of some six pounds' weight. At my approach he darted away like an arrow. But he hurry he knocked his head against an iron hook fixed in a post in the water, fracturing his skull and injuring the upper nerve on one side of the head. He appeared to suffer terrible pain; he plunged into the mud, floundered hither and thither, and at last, leaping out of the water, fell on the bank. On examination a portion of the brain was seen protruding through the fractured skull.

"This I carefully restored to its place, making use of a small silver toothpick to raise the splinters of bone home. The fish remained quiet during the operation; when it was over he plunged into the pond. At first his sufferings appeared to be relieved: but in the course of a few minutes he began rushing right and left until he again leaped out of the water.

"I called the keeper, and with his assistance applied a bandage to the fracture. That done, we restored him to the pond and left him to his fate. Next morning, as soon as I reached the water's edge, the pike swam to meet me quite close to the bank, and laid his head upon my feet. I thought this an extraordinary proceeding. Without further delay, I examined the wound and found it was healing nicely. I then stroked for some time by the side of the pike. The fish swam after me, following my steps, and purring as I turned.

"The following day, I brought a few young friends with me to see the fish. He swam toward me as before. Little by little he allowed me to come as to come to my whistle and eat out of my hand. With other persons, on the contrary, he continued as shy and as wild as ever."

This anecdote is averred to have been read, in 1850, before the Liverpool Literary and Philosophical Society.

The elephant, with a sort of humorous justice, is given to return injuries or insults in kind. In Madagascar the elephant's enemy, the rhinoceros, have a cocoa-nut in his hand, thought fit, out of bravado, to break it on the animal's head. The elephant made no protest at the time; but next day, passing a fruit-stall, he took a cocoa-nut in his trunk and returned the cornac's compliment so vigorously on the head that he killed him on the spot.

If vindictive, the elephant is also grateful. At Pondicherry, a soldier who treated an elephant to a dram of arrack every time he received his pay, found himself the worse for liquor. Next day the guard were about to carry him off to prison, he took refuge under the elephant and fell asleep. The animal allowed no one to approach him, and watched him carefully all night. In the morning, after caressing with his trunk, he dismissed him to settle with the authorities as he best could.

Both revenge and gratitude imply intelligence; still more does the application of an unforeseen expedient. A train of artillery going to Seringapatam, had to cross the shingly bed of a river. A man who was sitting on a gun-carriage, fell: in another second the wheel would have passed over his body. An elephant walking by the side of the carriage saw the danger, and instantly, without any order from his keeper, lifted the wheel from the ground, leaving the fallen man uninjured.

At Clemency, on the borders of Switzerland, a wolf toward nightfall entered the village, and immediately gave chase to a small gray terrier belonging to no one in particular. Instead of taking shelter in the nearest cottage, the dog rushed on to the end of the hamlet, and, entering a wheel-wright's yard, leaped safe and sound into the kennel of a huge mastiff. The wolf had followed too closely to recede, and the mastiff, in spite of a heavy chain that cramped his movements, darted out suddenly and seized the wolf by the skin of the back. The sequel was remarkable. The mastiff, instead of the victim, began to yield to the struggles of the wolf, which was a full-grown powerful beast, when, just in the right moment, another large dog arrived at full speed, accompanied by the little terrier, who had evidently seen his comrade's need of assistance, and gone off to procure it. This unexpected ally put an end to the conflict, and the wolf was speedily mastered.

THE LUTHER MONUMENT.

We have before alluded to the inauguration of the LUTHER MONUMENT at Worms, on June 25th last, in connection with the singular fact that the same day was chosen as the day, because it was at the Diet held in that city in 1521 that LUTHER first came forward as the reformer of the Church. The monument is a noble one. There are thirteen statues in all; all colossal, but of different sizes, according to the height at which they stand. LUTHER, the largest and most important, stands on the top of a pedestal of his own; his head is upraised as in the attitude of prayer, which should right have been the one held in his left. Even so he must have looked as he uttered those famous closing words of his speech at the Diet of Worms, which are inscribed on the pedestal wherein he stands: "Here I stand: I can not do otherwise. God help me! Amen."

At each corner of LUTHER'S pedestal sits one of his precursors in the work of reformation, each chosen from a different country, to show that the work was not begun by LUTHER, but was rather the culmination of previous efforts. These four statues are PETRUS WALDUS, WICKLIFFE, HUSS, and SAVONAROLA. These are the statues on the base of the monument, and are to be surrounded by a stone balustrade, except on LUTHER'S side, where there are to be statues to the four counties in which he will not stand, like towners on a castle, the four cornerstones of the Reformation in Germany: on LUTHER'S right FREDERICK the Wise, of Saxony; on his left PHILIP the Magnanimous, of Hesse; behind PHILIP, REUCHLIN, the humanist; and behind FREDERICK the thoughtful and modest MELANCHTHON.

Between these corners will come, on three sides, high pedestals for statues to the twelve female figures—Spires, Augsburg, and Magdeburg. Spires, because there the Reformers first took the name of Protestants; Augsburg, for the cause of the Confession; and Magdeburg, the witness unto blood for the new Church, sitting sorrowful, with bowed head and broken sword. The pedestal is to bear certain portrait medallions and bass-reliefs, and on the coping of the walls are to be the medallion bearings of the twenty-four princes.

This work was planned by RIETSCHEL; but he died at the very beginning, and it has been finished by two of his pupils.

REVELATIONS OF POMPEII.

Few persons, perhaps, are aware of how much we are indebted in the matter of the preservation of history to the spade. By digging into the earth, where glimpses of the life of past generations have been stored and preserved almost as freshly as when they were deposited ages ago, we now see with our own eyes the domestic implements, the tools, the toys, and the luxuries of the ancients; and day by day we are filling in the picture of the past with the veritable pencil that time has given to our hands. The manner in which they spent their daily lives—matters which are more interesting, after all, than a mere history of wars and conquests—is becoming the truth of which it is so difficult to gain in the lifetime of any generation. Even with regard to Bible history, how much have we learned of the sacred places of Palestine by means of the excavations now being carried on by the committee under the secretaryship of Mr. GROVE! As these discoveries are daily brought to light by means of photography, every subscriber to the fund helps to add to our stock of facts and to our discoverers.

It is, perhaps, well that the earth has buried for centuries the remains of the buildings in which these events occurred. Had they been exposed to the weather in past times, art would have had to have been to preserve a regent infinitely what the spade has discovered. In the same way the ignorance of the Middle Ages (of that was destroyed by the eruption of Vesuvius long before the sacred events we have mentioned is now presented to us in the museum at Naples. Here we may gather the condition of the city, the ways of its people, their very attitudes in that scene of terror, as well as we could tell the routine of Parisian life fifty years ago. It will be remembered that the city of Pompeii was destroyed by the dust and ashes and gases from an eruption of the mountain, which fell softly, and fixed, as in a mould, all the inanimate objects as they then stood in the city, and, indeed, such of the inhabitants as could not escape. By a very ingenious method the gentleman who has had the direction of the works of excavation which have been for a long time carried on there, has presented to us not only the forms of some of the citizens, but the texture of their dresses, the hair, beards, and head-dresses, and the very attitudes of terror they presented when overwhelmed. His plan was this: Wherever the pick struck into a hollow, instead of breaking it up, he poured plaster of Paris into it—just, in fact, as he would into a mould—and in several cases he was rewarded by the early yielding up models of some of its long-perished people. In one case, a perfect group of Pompeians was thus preserved, and is now in the museum. Among these is a woman, apparently of noble birth, lying on her side, with limbs contracted, showing that she had died in convulsions. The form of the beadress is preserved, and the texture of her robe; the rings still remaining on the finger-bones, and not far from her was found a bunch of keys and some silver money, and the remains of a linen bag. A second lay beside her with an arm flung upon her hand; and in an apartment close at hand a young girl was discovered with her skirts thrown over her head to protect her from the falling pumice-stone. In some of the winters' shops the wine-stains are yet preserved upon the counters, and the meal was found in the corn. In the course of being built, the mortar is close at hand and the tools of the mason. There is something awfully touching to us in the discovery of this object, destroyed while in the act of being constructed. In the museum specimens of the interiors of houses of every grade of society are stored, and the domestic belongings of the Pompeians are brought before the spectator exactly as they appeared in life. In one case, where a dining-room was discovered, all the guests appeared to have been suffocated as they lay upon the dinner-table couches after partaking of their meal—or rather their skeletons did. All the furniture was found preserved in the most perfect manner; even the dishes, with some remnants of food, remained. The oven in the bake-shop was likewise discovered in use also found; and it is an evidence of the conservative habits of the people of the country that the city is governed exactly the same as this in which they are fashioned to this day at Palermo and neighboring cities. Possibly we shall never see such a perfect resurrection of a long past civilization as in the case of Pompeii, for the reason that the conditions of its destruction were the most favorable preservation even to the minutest details, which we can only liken to the wondrous preservation, even to the scales of fishes, of a pre-Adamite world, continually being found in geological formations.

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR TWENTY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oriode Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches, representing them to be Oriode Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oriode Watches. Any such representations are false. The genuine Oriode Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

Oroide Jewelry.

We are now manufacturing ORIODE JEWELRY, of the latest and most approved styles. No gold jewelry, however high the price, surpasses this in beauty and elegance. In exquisite workmanship, durability, and in keeping and excepting intrinsic value, it equals that of the gold which costs nearly ten times as much.

Ladies' Sets of Pins and Ear-rings from $3 00 to $10; Ladies' Sets of Pins, Ear-rings, and Sleeve-Buttons, from $5 to $15; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Sleeve-Buttons, $2 00 to $5 per pair. Every other kind of jewelry in the same proportion. All orders in sums of less than $5 must be accompanied by a Post-Office Order for the amount (send no money in letters), and the goods will be sent by mail free of expense to the purchaser. Orders for $5 or more will be sent by express, to be paid for on delivery, unless express charges.

Swinging Round the Circle.

There are fifty ways of alleviating the agonies of dyspepsia for the moment; but there is only one way to cure it, and that is permanently. Resort to the temporary palliatives, the patient finds that the disease, so far from being subdued, has actually gathered strength while he has been parleying with its symptoms.

The only way to get rid of the demon is to endow the stomach with sufficient strength to cast it out and keep it out. Impart permanent energy to the digestive organs with and the object is accomplished. This powerful vegetable remedy is not a mere stimulant. It does not brace up the gastric energies by the use of fire, leaving it, when the temporary excitement has passed off, in a worse state than before. Such is the effect of the ordinary alcoholic nostrums. Not only do the stomach in a perpetual see-saw between unnatural activity and utter relaxation. Not so the BITTERS. We employ only such alterative, aromatic and vegetabilious extracts, they permanently re-enforce and continuously regulate the assimilating organs. Such is the experience of tens of thousands. At this debilitating season of the year, when the solvent principle of the gastric juice is weakened by a constant drain of the animal fluids through the pores, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS is an article of prime necessity every week. To neglect the use of a tonic and alterative so wonderfully efficacious and entirely harmless is simply to forego the blessings of health and vigor, and voluntarily accept feebleness and discomfort in their stead.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish Steel, Gold-Plated Aluminum Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has received the highest attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press, but the commendation of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $22. Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

OF THE

RAILROAD

Are now finished and in entire operation. One hundred and sixty miles have been built in the last four months. More than twenty thousand men are employed, and the average of forty miles per month will be maintained throughout the season, making THREE HUNDRED COMPLETED MILES by January 1st, and it is now probable that the ENTIRE GRAND LINE TO THE PACIFIC WILL BE OPEN FOR BUSINESS IN 1869.

No other first-class railroad in the world has been built and equipped so rapidly as the Union Pacific, which runs west from Omaha.

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

The United States Government makes of its railroad a GREAT NATIONAL WORK, and aids in construction by very liberal grants of money and of lands. To further insure the speedy completion of the Road, the Company are authorized to issue their own

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS,

having thirty years to run, and having interest coupons payable semi-annually at the rate of six per cent. in gold. The principal, as well as interest, is made

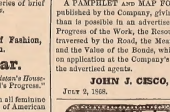
PAYABLE IN GOLD.

The Mortgage Bonds of nearly all other railroads in the country are payable, principal and interest, in currency; and it is asserted, without fear of contradiction, that no other railroad company in the world, relating to so great an extent of road, issues bonds of equal value with the First Mortgage Bonds now offered for sale by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The price of these Bonds is now 102 and accrued interest from July 1, at which price the Company believe that at this price their Bonds are the

Safest and Most Profitable Investment

in the market, and they confidently expect that they will shortly command a higher premium than any similar security. The Company reserve the right to advance the price at any time, and will not fill any orders or receive any subscriptions on which the money has not been actually paid at the Company's office before the time of such advance. Subscriptions will be received in New York



AT THE COMPANY'S OFFICE,
No. 20 NASSAU STREET,
And by JOHN J. CISCO & SON, BANKERS,
No. 59 WALL STREET.

And by the Company's advertised agents throughout the United States.

Remittances should be made in drafts or other funds par in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local agents, will look to them for their safe delivery.

A PAMPHLET and MAP FOR 1868 has just been published by the Company, giving fuller information than is possible in an advertisement, respecting the Progress of the Work, the Resources of the Country traversed by the Road, the Means for Construction, and the Value of the Bonds, which will be sent free on application at the Company's offices or to any of the advertised agents.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY
OF
THE GREAT REBELLION
IN
THE UNITED STATES.

By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

This is one of the great enterprises of the day. The historical matter is really valuable; the sketches of individuals and incidents are admirably drawn, not only by the pen of the historian, but by the pencil of the artist, and both combined will make, when bound, one of the marked histories of this war, if not the great history of the war. There are official documents on every page, at the bottom, which add much to the value of the work. It will be found on the centre-tables of thousands of our countrymen.—Boston Post.

Many of its illustrative pictures are the best that we have seen in such a work; and some of the numerous portraits of gentlemen distinguished in the war are admirable as likenesses and works of art.—London Athenæum.

This is as valuable a work as ever was compiled on a historical subject.—Zion's Herald.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and in the size and beauty of its pages and paper, in the profuseness, costliness, elegance, and completeness of its illustrations, far exceeding any other history yet attempted.—New York Observer.

We speak confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. This narrative, embellished by the picturesque illustrations, affords an interesting commentary on the war, and will be of priceless value for preservation.—Boston Advertiser.

The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation.—New York Tribune.

Never has the war's story been better told than it is in these vigorous, truthful, and critically written pages.—Boston Traveller.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RECONSTRUCTION.

SAMUEL LOVER.

DIED JULY 15, 1868.

So pass they from us, each his silent way,
The cherish'd ones whose names our memories store.
Death turns upon them his cold gaze, and straight
They are no more!

One brave, true soul! One tried and loving heart!
For him the national flag shall mourn;
For him the minstrel's harp shall breathe its wail;
For him the clarion sound.
The stranger sadly breathe his name: the friend
Lament forlorn.

His was the witching voice, that, we believed,
Will might the ear of Death itself arrest;
And his the wit that might the phantom's hand
Join with a jest.

But he is gone! He will not charm us more;
The ripple of the pleasant song is still;
The pulse that quick'd to touch the lyre—but who
To younger hands he yields the lyre—but who Shall caught his skill?

If can we spare him from the fitful glare
Of bright, fresh healthy slippers left us now;
Our solace is—the wreath of a life's fame
Glows on his brow!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1868.

"AT THE POINT OF THE BAYONET."

EVERY day makes it plainer that the policy of which the Democratic party has chosen to make the public judgment in this campaign is not one of administration merely, but of absolute and forcible revolution. It proposes to reverse all the national legislation of the three last years, to subvert the reconstruction which the country has approved, to disperse organized State governments by force, and to place in the State executive those who for the highest crime against the Commonwealth have been temporarily disfranchised; to deprive hundreds of thousands of citizens of the right of the ballot, and thrust them back into a semi-enslaved condition—; project which can not be accomplished but by the most sanguinary measures. They are planning a wholly military test of citizenship in color—a test involving caste and inconceivable injustice, which embraces the entire disabled class, and would keep a large body of the loyal people—it announces that if its claim is disregarded it will appeal to "physical force," and place its candidate in the White House at the point of the bayonet.

It will not be forgotten that the party which thus enters into a political campaign with a loud threat of civil war is the same that has previously made the same threat and fulfilled it to the letter. In 1860 the Democratic orators said that "the South" could not be expected to submit to the election of Mr. LINCOLN. In 1856 Mr. FILLMORE, absurdly called Conservative, had said the same thing in view of the election of Mr. FREMONT. It was not hesitancy merely. Whatever of the Southern portion of the party may have thought—intended, the Southern portion was sincere and resolved; and it was that portion which had entirely controlled the party and dictated its policy, because it was the positive element.

This history repeats itself. In 1864 the positive element was the Copperhead majority represented by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM made the Democratic platform of that year, which was merely a proposal to accept the rebellion and secure its success. In any event it was revolution: and revolution in the interest of the Slaveholding oligarchy. The national conservatism of the majority, however, were too strong: the Union and progressive free society were saved. In 1868 the same spectacle is presented. The will is the same. But the passion and purposes of its chief instigators remain. Defeat in the effort to destroy the Union has not taught them love of the Union. It has found hostility to the principles of society which have prevailed, and to an interpretation of the character of the government which has triumphed, does not lead to acquiescence but to not further struggle. Foiled in the field, what chance is there in political intrigue? Oppressed with debt, stranded by long and severe exertion of every kind, vexed by the delay of complete pacification, is not the country an army fatigued after its victory, sleeping upon the field, and fatally and easily won during desperate outbreak? This was the question with which the old, positive, ruling element of the Democratic party entered its Convention. Part of the Northern people with that element confidently had suggested in advance some acknowledgement of actual events. The war, it said, essentially, may have been a mistake, but it must be honestly paid for. Reconstruction may be unconstitutional, but it is accomplished, and can be reversed only in the way itself provided. The party, justly or unjustly, has become such a stench in the national nostrils that it may be better to take a candidate from without its lines. Indeed, said this wing of the party, with an air of valor, on the very day before the Convention met, if the Southern delegates take part in the action of the Convention, they must abide by it.

It may be imagined with what disdain the Southern delegations read these words in a paper which their more distant from the front, and to renounce its candidate. They came to the Convention led by WADE HAMPTON, a relentless Southern Carolina rebel, who declared upon his way to take his seat that the cause of the rebellion was not yet lost. WADE HAMPTON the rebel, and VALLANDIGHAM the Copperhead, combined, and ruled the Convention. Instead of recognizing actual events, their effort was to undo the result of seven years. The spirit of the war was not made the platform. VALLANDIGHAM put into it repudiation, which is national disgrace; and WADE HAMPTON the reversal of reconstruction, which is military disgrace. Then HORATIO SEYMOUR was made candidate for President, who had declared that the success of the war would be the ruin of the Union; and FRANK BLAIR for Vice-President, who had insisted that reconstruction should be subverted by force, and who said that he wished every Democratic candidate pledged to it. After nominated upon that declaration of principles, a party pledged to the subversion of the Government, which is truly the van-guard of equal constitutional liberty? Think of WADE HAMPTON, of VALLANDIGHAM, of THOMPSON, of SEYMOUR, of FORREST, of of FERNANDO WOOD, with a policy founded upon their declarations and principles, proposing JAMES BUCHANAN as the political policy of the time for the Union! Is that by any possibility or sophistication a policy of peace or an era of any thing but the most complete overthrow? Is there any American citizen, still open to argument and reflection, honestly suppose that the spirit of WADE HAMPTON is more the spirit of peace and fraternity than the spirit of General LEE, or that the career and the declarations of FRANK BLAIR promise wiser counsels than those of SCHUYLER COLFAX?

Yet this is the amply defined issue which the Democratic party has chosen to offer to the country; and it could not have done a greater service to the Union than by making the offer. Its success would be a calamity unprincipled minority, instead of its relentless and haughty majority—had it veiled its hatreds and its hopes—it might have pushed its hand nearer the helm, and plunged it burns to clutch. But it deploys upon the open field. It flaunts its black flags in the sunlight. It loudly denounces republican principles. It openly, eagerly threatens civil war if the country will but give it a chance. Let the country lift its eyes—let it behold the years from Sumter to Appomattox—let it remember who and what made those years—and answer!

THE TRUTH VS. "A GREAT STATESMAN."

THE Democratic organs are fond of saying that the only document which the party of ROBERT TOOMBS and VALLANDIGHAM need to circulate to insure success is the speech of Mr. SEYMOUR upon the flag. They seem to suppose that the country must have the profoundest confidence in a party whose financial ability has been illustrated in successive offices by the mass of economic and patriotic devotion as the last Democratic Secretary of War, JOHN B. FLOYD, and the last Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, JAMES BUCHANAN. But, even in the absence of any such conspicuous national officers, the country desires to study the Democratic genius for economy and financial administration, as it exists in the municipal government of the city of New York. Or if, unwilling to decide by examples, it would know the exact facts in regard to the wretched waste of power in the Republican party, let it begin by ascertaining the truth of Mr. SEYMOUR's statements.

A plausible orator, who fluently relies upon the ear to detect error, is not very safe until his figures can be verified. Mr. SEYMOUR is very apt at that kind of argument which exact knowledge always confounds. His eloquence is eminent way be pardoned if it can not stop the moment marshal the facts which dispose of the figures which the orator has carefully crammed. But the mindless audience-man can not finally outrun justice. A year ago Mr. SANFORD E. CHURCH, Chairman of the Finance Committee in the Constitutional Convention of New York, made an elaborate report, involving a great quantity of figures intended to prove that the State was practically bankrupt. It was framed as a partisan campaign document. It alarmed many persons who had no means of verifying its statements, or of discovering its sophistries. Mr. HUTCHINS in the CONVENTION, and Mr. D. A. WELLS in reply to inquiries of Mr. JOHN M. FRANCIS, made vigorous exposures of the document. But it served its purpose. It was a good MORMAN.

Mr. SEYMOUR has been tarying the game upon a larger scale. In his New York speech, just before the election, he unrolled an imposing array of figures to show not only the enormity of the taxation of the country, but the reckless waste of the administration. The moral of his speech was evident; if you would have taxation lessened and enjoy a severely economical system put those famous financiers H. SEYMOUR & Co. into power. Now mark how plain a tale puts a demag—that is to say, a "great statesman" to shame. Judge his whole assertion by a part of it. Mr. SEYMOUR says, "Since the war closed in 1865 the Government has spent in addition to its payment on its expenses, in addition to its payment on the principal and interest of the public debt, more than one thousand million of dollars. Of this sum there has been nearly eight hundred millions spent on the army and navy and for military purposes. This is nearly one-third of the national debt. This was spent in time of peace." There is a nearly sufficient assertion. A third of the national debt has accumulated since the war closed, and the country is paying for its army and navy nearly $270,000,000 in a time of profound peace. Could there be a more extravagance? Could any thing call more loudly for H. SEYMOUR & Co. ?

Now Mr. BLAINE, a very efficient and able representative in Congress, from the State of Representative in Congress, from the State of Maine, heard, through the Democratic papers, these smooth and fluent assertions of Mr. SEYMOUR, and he immediately went to the Treasury Department to ascertain their accuracy. And this was what he found. When the war ended there were nearly a million of men in the Union armies, about five hundred vessels, with their proper crews, blockading three thousand miles of coast. This immense force was mustered out of service as rapidly as possible. Within two years there were no more than half the army; the closing bounty was due to all; and the sailors, besides back-pay, had millions of prize-money to receive. The vast sum was to be provided at once, and the people supplied it. Thus, within one hundred and seventy-four days after GRANT's closing victory, the Treasury disbursed $83,000,000. In no more than three-fourths of the sum stated by Mr. SEYMOUR as the war and navy expenses of the last three years, and intended by him to convey the impression that they were the current rate of those expenses—and these three-fourths of the whole amount he mentions were disbursed in one sum at the close of hostilities. This was the record of mustering out the vast forces of the Union. These $625,000,000, being deducted from Mr. SEYMOUR's total of $800,000,000, show that the current annual expenses of both branches have been $175,000,000, or a little more than $58,000,000 for each year. Now, as to the current expenses of economy, it appears by the report for 1858, under Mr. BUCHANAN, the expenses of the navy were $14,000,000 in gold, and of the army nearly $26,000,000 in gold; for both nearly $40,000,000 in gold, for a smaller army and navy than those which the rebellion has rendered necessary. That is to say, the army to-day, under the management of General GRANT, costs much less per regiment in paper than it cost per regiment in gold under the last Democratic administration.

Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR, it seems, quotes figures, and partly by concealing, partly by distorting their true significance, produces an entirely false impression. This would be unspeakably contemptible in a demagogue. What is it in "a great statesman?"

VIEWS OF A DEMOCRATIC LEADER.

THAT some of those who tried to destroy the Union would have consented to save slavery may have been sincere may be admitted. But that those whose only feeling is profound regret and mortification at their failure, who still believe in the right of secession, and the excellence of slavery, and who frankly acknowledge that they do not despair of the cause, should be intrusted with the Government of the United States is to us evil. A man like General LONGSTREET, who honestly declares that he thought his view correct, that he submitted to the decision of the sword, that the sword decided against him, that he yields to the decision and will make the best of it, is a man whom every body can respect and trust. So one, too, is HAMPTON, who also announces that although wrested in the field he yet hopes to make his cause triumphant, may be respected for his frankness, but he is to be trusted in a position only as a torch may be trusted in a powder magazine.

Now WADE HAMPTON is a representative of the Democratic leaders in this campaign at the Southern States. The spirit of his speeches is that which animates the supporters of SEYMOUR and BLAIR. He is, as the New York World declares, the successor of CALHOUN in the affections of South Carolina—the word South Carolina being used to describe those inhabitants of the State who hold CALHOUN's nullification and secession theories. Upon his way to New York, as a delegate to the Democratic Convention, General HAMPTON proudly proclaimed his unfaltering faith in the final success of the rebellion. In the Convention he was placed upon the Committee on the platform, and he added to it the words describing the reconstruction acts as "unfortunate, unconstitutional, and void;" and he says that every single member of the Committee warmly approved and declared that they would carry out those words to the end. At a ratification meeting in New York before he left General HAMPTON proposed that if there were a majority of white voters which he thought might be obtained, an opinion in which the KU-KLUX KLAN agrees—the SEYMOUR and BLAIR were to be put into the White House at the point of the bayonet.

Upon his way home General HAMPTON spoke in Baltimore. His speech was an expression of ardent admiration and sympathy for MARYLAND's leaders who, like Marshal KANE, took arms upon the rebel side. These were "the brave and true men of that immortal army." Reaching Charleston he was received by his friends of the Democratic party with enthusiasm. The speech he made was a glowing rhapsody in honor of State rights, and a boundless eulogy of the men who, with him, had fought against their country. Speaking of the recreant soldier who, with conscious falsehood, announced that the battle cry of the Union soldiers was "Liberty and beauty," WADE HAMPTON exclaimed: "So long as patriotism, constancy, nd valor are esteemed the wondrous story of her, [Charleston's] defense will stir the hearts of brave men, and noble women will teach their children to lisp the name of BEAUREGARD." The whole speech is conceived in the intensest spirit of devotion to South Carolina as opposed to the United States. There is not a thought, an emotion, a word in it which is not inspired by the old South Carolina provincial jealousy of the Union and devotion to CALHOUN's doctrine of supreme State sovereignty. As for the colored citizens this chivalric gentleman says plainly let them vote for SEYMOUR and BLAIR or stones. Keep among yourselves, and act firmly on this agreement, that you will not employ any one who votes the Radical ticket. Use all the means that are placed in your hands to control this element." The next morning General HAMPTON repeated the substance of the speech, saying that he still held to all that he had said, that he should have loved so well and defended so gallantly, and he would cherish it until they had a State again.

Is this the kind of talk which becomes those who, when they simply requires peace above all things, aspire to direct the government? After our experience of the last seven years do we want CALHOUN again and his theories and doctrines? Yet this is what the Democratic party proposes. Again, as for years before the war, the inhuman purposes and impracticable theories of the Democratic statesmen control its councils. They were always the bane, they have lately been the tragedy, of our politics. Those who would avoid a repetition of the example of the massacre of loyal soldiers—who would justify WADE HAMPTON's rebellion and abandon four millions of loyal people to unimaginable misery—must do as WADE HAMPTON advises, and vote for SEYMOUR and BLAIR. Those who are convinced that CALHOUN was the most fatal enemy of the principles of the Union, and who are resolved that the enormous expense of money and of life in the war shall have gained something, will now throw their votes, as four years ago they raised their prayers, for GRANT, liberty, and peace.

A "TYRANT" AND A "BUTCHER."

ON the 4th of July, 1863, when HORATIO SEYMOUR was violently asking a New York mob "Where are the victories that were promised us?" and instigating the riots that broke out a fortnight afterward, GENERAL GRANT was receiving the surrender of Vicksburg and of the Mississippi, after one of the most heroic and skillful campaigns in military history. On the 14th President LINCOLN wrote to him the following letter:

"MY DEAR GENERAL,—I do not remember that you and I ever met personally. I write this now as a grateful acknowledgment for the splendid, unparalleled service you have done the country. I write to say a word further. When you first reached the vicinity of Vicksburg I thought you should do what you finally did—march the troops across the neck, run the fleet past the rebel batteries, and thus go below; and I never had any fault, except a general hope that you were not too slow. I think the Yazoo Pass expedition and the like, so to succeed. When you got below, and took Port Gibson, Grand Gulf, and Hankinson's Ferry, and you should go down the river and join General BANKS, and when you turned northward, east of general BANKS, and when you turned northward, east of Big Black, I feared it was a mistake. I now wish to make the personal acknowledgment that you were right and I was wrong.

A. LINCOLN."

"Yours truly,

When GRANT was entering upon the final and triumphant campaign, which ended the rebellion, he wrote to a friend on the 30th April, 1864:

"LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT,—Not expecting to see you before the spring campaign opens, I wish to express to you in writing my entire satisfaction with what you have done up to this time so far as I understand it.

"The particulars of your plan I neither know nor seek to know. You are vigilant and self-reliant, and, pleased with this, I wish not to obtrude any restraints or constraints upon you. While I am very anxious that any great disaster or capture of our men in great number shall be avoided, I know that these points are less likely to escape your attention than they would be mine. If there be any thing wanting which is within my power to give, do not fail to let me know it.

"And now, with a brave army and a just cause, may God sustain you!

"Yours very truly,

A. LINCOLN."

General GRANT replied the next day from his head-quarters in the field as follows:

"Your very kind letter of yesterday is just received. The confidence you express for the future, and satisfaction for the past, in my military administration, is acknowledged with pride. It shall be my earnest endeavor that you and the country shall not be disappointed. From my first entrance into the volunteer service of the country to the present day I have never had cause of complaint; have never expressed or implied a complaint against the Administration or the Secretary of War, for throwing any embarrassment in the way of my vigorously prosecuting what appeared to be my duty.

"Indeed, since the promotion which placed me in command of all the armies, and in view of the great responsibility and importance of success, I have been astonished at the moderation with which every thing asked for has been yielded, without even an explanation being asked. Should my success be less than I desire and expect, the least I can say is, the fault is not with you.

"Very truly, your obedient servant,

"U. S. GRANT, Lieutenant-General."

It is instructive to contrast with this ecstasy of an "odious tyrant" and a ferocious "butcher" the earnest, untiring, patriotic devotion to the Union and the Constitution of THOMAS VILLANUEVA, SEYMOUR, COMB, COX, PENDLETON, FORREST, and Company. All true Conservatives will of course agree with Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS that the only way to save the Constitution is to destroy it, and will follow the advice of Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS by electing SEYMOUR.

THE FALL TRADE.

The monthly report of the Agricultural Department for July is more favorable as to the breadth of land in the United States devoted to grain, and the condition of all the crops we raise, than any hitherto presented; and as there are strong indications of a considerable foreign demand for our products, it may be inferred that the fall trade will be as active as the year of an earnest political contest will allow. The report to the 28th July, with respect to cotton, shows that but eighty thousand bales for export and use remained in the United States, the price of which on the 1st instant advanced on the spot and in the active market, due in part to speculation, but chiefly to the difficulty of obtaining good middlings, as the quantity thus estimated at the several ports constituted the entire stock of that staple in this country. It is not so easy to arrive at an estimate of the quantity of cotton goods manufactured and held at the mills and by jobbers; but as there was no stock on hand in May and part of June, it is inferred with confidence that the quantity on hand, and to be manufactured, is not at all in excess of what will be required up to the time when the new crop will appear. Sales of raw cotton are since reported quiet.

The Imperial decree admitting cereals into France free of tonnage duty after October next will be accepted as evidence of a large foreign demand for our agricultural productions.

Our imports are somewhat lighter than were those of last year to this period, and it is well known that country merchants have been purchasing with unusual caution, and are consequently not largely stocked.

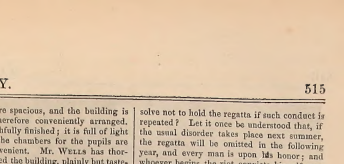
A new feature in our exports—which we trust may hereafter be on a scale of equality at least with our imports, for no country is safe which permanently runs in the latter—has been developed, owing to the drought in England. One of the steamers of WILLIAMS & GUION'S has took out on her last voyage a quantity of hay. Hay has not, we think, been exported to Europe for many years. The quantity of oil-cake found in the market was immediately procured and, there, and contracts for its future delivery as manufactured were also made by English agents. Clover seed was sent over to Europe on the termination of the drought, and the wants due to the same cause partially supplied by the export of cheese, butter, lard, bacon, corn, etc., which articles must continue to go abroad until a new crop can relieve the scarcity.

All the conditions, therefore, required for such a fall trade as we have indicated will be found to exist if there is no disappointment with respect to our crops. They constitute the real basis of our prosperity, inasmuch as probably seven-tenths of our population are devoted to agriculture, and their labor is employed on lands which yield the most bountiful harvests, except in the few States in which they have been partially exhausted by careless cultivation.

The question whether or not there is anything in the condition of our finances and policy to interfere with an active trade can not be overlooked.

The platform of the Democratic party affirms that the action of Congress in subjecting the southern States to its policy of Reconstruction is unconstitutional, null, and void, and General GRANT declares that it is the duty of the President using the forces of the United States for the purpose by the new governments aside, and reinstate those which existed during the rebellion. With respect to the Five-Twenties, they allege the right and duty to pay them in greenbacks. These doctrines, which are revolutionary in their character, and are based on heresy, can not be adopted by the people of the United States without giving a reverse action to its whole machinery, political and financial, and creating anxiety at home and abroad. We misconstrue all the signs of the times, and place a very erroneous estimate on the wisdom, virtue, and firmness of the American people, if they are willing, at the very moment of success in that experiment, and when the Southern States are about to emerge from pecuniary troubles, owing to bountiful crops of grain, and the promise of a good cotton crop, to plunge them and this country once more into those difficulties which General GRANT foresaw when, in his letter of acceptance of the presidential nomination, he stated that it would be his policy and duty, if elected, to secure peace. He discerned, long in advance of the assemblage of the Democratic Convention, that this single word, not only revealed the purpose of the canvass, but that it constituted the basis of our prosperity as a people, and this the election of General GRANT will no doubt secure.

NATURALIZED CITIZENS.



There is no country so interested in the naturalization question as the United States, because there is none which has so large and so constantly increasing a foreign population. As we have more than once shown, however, while the country has often talked of its policy and position upon the subject, as if they were peculiar, it has had none whatever except the custom of other nations. It is now plain that some decisive declaration of principle should be made. It is absurd for us to permit any power to claim as subjects persons who have been admitted to citizenship in the United States, and who take part in the government of the country. But foreign powers are rapidly conceding our view of this subject, and are treating with us for the security of naturalized citizens. It is this the moment to select to strike the attitude and insist that if our views are not accepted the most direful results will instantly ensue? What we want is good sense and good humor, not buncomb and bluster.

There are two methods in which the subject may be disposed of. We may declare by law that if a claim of foreign allegiance shall be practically asserted against a naturalized American citizen, he shall be tried for treason by subject of the offending government, and virtually declare war. Or we may settle the matter by treaty and mutual right. This question is especially of the kind called international. The different nations, not their rulers only, are concerned in the subject of expatriation. The situation and necessities of each will govern their public opinion, should be fairly considered. But if every nation is to define its policy upon such questions in a harsh and haughty manner—if, for instance, we declare that a naturalized law upon the subject we have hitherto followed, and which has always asserted what we are persuaded has now become an unreasonable and intolerable doctrine, says that she is ready to accept our general view of the question, and to make some mutual amicable arrangement, ought we to insist that we will settle it by a resort to arms, to which we will compel her assent at the point of the bayonet?

Such a proposition is as unreasonable and intolerable as the old British doctrine itself. It is unmanly, dishonorable, and therefore wholly unworthy of the United States. Our first duty is plainly to obtain by reference by treaty. If the attempt prove to be impracticable—if England or any nation declines to yield—that we feel that we can not properly relinquish—we are then perfectly justified in settling it alone, and by laws that we must unhesitatingly enforce by all recognized and worthy international means. But the course of Germany, and the words of the British Foreign Secretary, show that we are not yet compelled to take this course. The question is, upon every account, better settled by peace, and foreign powers are willing and ready to treat. They are considering the terms of a good international understanding; and we, knowing precisely what we want, may wisely wait a little while before we are determined, knowing, as we do, that at such a time and under such circumstances no naturalized citizen is a serious danger.

THE WELLS SEMINARY.

Upon the eastern shore of Cayuga lake, twelve miles above Cayuga bridge, and in the very centre and garden of New York, is the little village of Aurora. It is sometimes called a hamlet with a few hundreds of inhabitants; but it has a delightful aspect of general comfort and rural repose. Among those who have chosen this pleasant spot for a home is HENRY WELLS, noted in the Express business as one of its founders and most skillful managers. For many years it has been his wish to devote an ample sum of money to the foundation of a school for the higher education of women upon the same general plan as the Vassar College at Poughkeepsie. In pursuance of this intention Mr. WELLS devoted to the purposes of the seminary a part of his fine estate immediately adjoining the grounds of his own residence; and at his request Mr. S. D. MAYNARD, who is himself an architect of modesty, ability, and of the utmost conscience in his profession, his erected a substantial and admirable edifice in a simple Norman style, upon the long western slope of the hill to the lake.

the grounds are spacious, and the building is simply and therefore conveniently arranged. It is most faithfully finished; it is full of light and air, and the chambers for the pupils are large and convenient. Mr. WELLS has thoroughly furnished the building, plainly but tastefully; and a more delightful home for the pursuit of learning can not be found.

On the 23d of July, the Seminary building being completed, Mr. WELLS executed a deed of gift to a Board of Trustees for the purposes mentioned. For him it was a day of unalloyed gratification in the satisfactory accomplishment of a noble purpose, and for the lovely village a memorable festival. The lake steamer brought friends from all around and landed them upon a wharf wreathed and garlanded. Under a green arch they passed into the grounds of the Seminary, and at one o'clock the ceremonies of dedication took place in the large hall. Prayers were made; the charter of incorporation and the deed of gift were read; Mr. WELLS presented the charter in a brief and very appropriate address; speeches were delivered, and the benediction pronounced. Then there was a simple collation, and in the evening a reception and a merry dance. The day was beautiful; the order of exercises promptly followed, and every auspice was fair. Among the guests was EZRA CORNELL, the founder of the Cornell University at the head of the lake only twenty-eight miles away, and a most friendly greeting was offered by the Seminary to the University. In a few words of response Mr. CORNELL suggested with practical sagacity that the Seminary so amply founded needed but one thing, and that was a permanent endowment; and he proposed to be one of a hundred to subscribe a thousand dollars each for an endowment fund. He said that so noble an institution ought to be the resort of the poorer girls who could not afford to pay the fees which would be necessary to support such a Seminary. But without an endowment it would be necessarily so expensive that it would be a school for rich rather than for poor girls. Mr. CORNELL'S remarks were very cogent, and will hardly fail to be very effective.

It is to be hoped that the donation of fortunes by private men to great public ends that the State of New York is becoming truly imperial. ASTOR, COOPER, VASSAR, CORNELL, WELLS, are examples of their own. These fortunes are the accumulations of their individual energy, sagacity, and industry. Their example inspires them to be of money-getting, and relieves great wealth of a sordid taint. The purpose which inspires them is the noble tribute of practical sagacity to the essential dignity and value of the diffusion of knowledge. MATTHEW VASSAR was a brewer. At the close of a long and successful life he builds a spacious and imposing college, which will adequately accommodate the number of girls given to it thorough appointment, and its Board of Trustees fill it with accomplished teachers, MARIA MITCHELL among the rest, the heart and hand of the founder are devoted to the work. He sees his college established, successful, renowned; and on a soft summer morning as he sits reading to the Trustees a statement of his further hopes and wishes, his voice fails, his head gently falls upon his breast, and the old man is dead. Such are few scenes more memorable; there is no death more beautiful. The old man had learned the secret of the incorruptible treasure. He understood that the duty of the rich man is to be the almoner of the divine bounty.

THE ANNUAL UNIVERSITY DISGRACE.

The annual meeting of the Harvard and Yale boat clubs at Worcester for the University regatta has become an annual disgrace. The glory of the winning crew is entirely lost in the shame of the conduct of the collegians. Harvard, Yale, and Worcester character are involved in a common ignominy. The youth of Worcester, and of the country who are not "college bred," are the stupid riot of the "young gentlemen" from the Universities, and feel only contempt for unmanly rowdies and roaring bullies. In the days of town and gown, when the students were exposed to broken heads in open warfare, there was at least a feeling of fair play that redeemed the business from being degraded. But in these Worcester performances are like the excursions of Dead Rabbits from the city to some suburb, which they overrun with drunken riot, terrifying women and children, and richly meriting a sousse in the duck-pond.

As the experience of some years has now shown that Worcester and all decent society have no reputable or profitable connection with this incursion of students, it is but fair to act accordingly. Next year, therefore, when the inevitable occurs why should not the authorities, as the arrests are made, publish the names of the rioters in full? The young gentlemen will thus have all the renown of their noble deeds. But better still, the whole good name of all students and of the Universities is involved, since all gentlemen and scholars are concerned that the name of a noble sport is not mocked by these disorders, why will not the Universities solve not to hold the regatta if such conduct is repeated? Let it once be understood that, if the usual disorder takes place next summer, the regatta will be omitted in the following year, and every man is upon his honor; and whoever begins the riot convicts himself as a selfish lout who will be sent to Coventry by all gentlemen.

The reform must begin among the students themselves, and of course among those who form the majority of this annual row and who are competent to correct it. Little children in the streets and drunken vagabonds in the barroom are not the best models of behavior for students at two great Universities.

HOW MUCH CAN WE STAND?

American statesmen are model believers in the hope and sinew of their countrymen. And they have boundless confidence in the reviving Providence, and in all the subsidiary agencies of wind and weather, of soil and climate, of spindles and looms. The prodigies of trade and commerce, the proverbial accidents of industry, and the upsetting proclivity of circumstances, are quite too subtle, too remote from the creed of the unsophisticated, to ask for their instant habits of calculation and comprehension. Such things require study, and they do not find much favor among the intellectual virtues. They agree with FOSELI that no great ideas ever entered the mind by piecemeal. And, genius-like, they legislate accordingly.

Events always rewards a true and generous confidence. But it always punishes a false and romantic confidence. The essence of statesmanship is discrimination, in knowing what to trust and how far to trust, in seeing clearly and vividly that accidents are as much a part of this world's system as its laws; and, furthermore, that the value of statesmanship lies in the faculty of foreseeing in what way these fortuitous circumstances are likely to combine and what consequences are to ensue. The vice of American statesmanship is its ethereal neglect of the accidental element in human affairs, and hence it has ever been the most unprophetic statesmanship in the history of the world. It has rarely had any prescience. It presumes with an amazing recklessness on the bounty of nature and the productive industry of its citizens with little regard to the limits of human energy and the easy exhaustion of human forbearance.

The world owes Dr. CHALMERS a debt of gratitude for the clear and forcible way in which great breadth of illustration the doctrine of the recuperative power of nations. And MILL has done well to reset the great truth in the charms of his lucid argumentation. But while our statesmanship assumes this truth and acts upon it, we are entitled to the benefit of commonsense in proportion as industry of the country on such a basis that it can fully exert its energies and restore its lost prosperity. The resources of the land are great enough for common-sense people—great enough to rescue us from this ruin impending—but not great enough to be trifled with and legislated away into chaffy nothingness. BUCKLE argues very sensibly, that the best legislation of modern times has consisted in undoing former legislation, and we commend the idea to our law-makers.

THE REBEL YELL.

The Mobile Register, edited by JOHN FORSYTH, one of the most virulent of rebels, speaking of the rebel yell in Tammany Hall and the selection of SEYMOUR was announced, says:

"How clear that note used to ring upon the air of Virginia or of Mississippi in years long past! And who that heard it, or heard of it, will ever forget the panic it sent to the American which rescued it? Only Mississippians pasted it forth at the welcome voice to charge the hosts of Montcrief! But it is not to be lost by the Mississippi papers as they recount the incidents of their recent victory over violence and fraud; and it will make the air resonant from the Rio Grande to the Potomac at the last irresistible charge next November, cheering the hearts of our Democratic friends and chilling those of our oppressors. Stand by for that yell!"

Ay, ay, Sir! The Union boys are not very much afraid. Mr. GRANT they silenced that yell in 1865, and with GRANT they will silence it again in 1868.

CASTLE GARDEN LABOR EXCHANGE.

THE Labor Exchange lately organized at Castle Garden, the landing-place for emigrants to this city, is one of the most valuable and successful institutions in New York. During the short existence it has done much to break up the old, vile system of "runners," through whom unwary new-comers have been enticed into boarding-houses to be robbed, or worse establishments to be ruined. The Labor Exchange is a free market for emigrant labor, open to employers from all parts of the United States. While procuring prompt and reliable help for employers to engage, a just and remunerative employment opportunities to others to secure superior opportunities to choose suitable employés out of the large and varied supply of applicants for work daily coming to this office. It charges no fees, commissions, nor any other remuneration; it furnishes without cost information of every description to employers not only domestic help, but also all kinds of skilled and unskilled labor, and artisans; and specially laborers, mechanics, and farmers; and all letters are exclusively for the use and benefit of employers contemplating the sale or leasing propositions contemplating the sale or leasing of land to emigrants are rejected. Employers must either be known to the Superintendent, or must furnish satisfactory references, and agents must produce satisfactory references, and agents must be duly authorized by their principals, and come well recommended.

It does not make contracts for emigrants with the employer; it does not fix the amount of wages nor the terms of service, but prescribe wages nor the terms of service, but prescribe any other condition of the contract; it leaves all these matters to be settled by the voluntary agreement of the parties immediately interested; it only assists them only by giving all needful information and advice.

The subjoined report of the transactions at the Labor Exchange from January 1 to July 1, 1868, shows that a great work has been accomplished by it. During the six months named it found employment for 7111 male and 3840 female laborers; among them 284 entire families. Male laborers; among them 284 entire families. Male laborers obtained work for from $120 to $180 (besides board and lodging). Female domestic servants obtain from $6 to $10 per month. Farm hands took have been engaged from $12 to $20 per month. Emigrants are at present reluctant to take Southern engagements, because of unfavorable impressions prevail in regard to the situation and treatment of the Southern laborer, the kind and quality of food and lodging furnished to him, and the prompt and sure payment of his wages. The emigrant will build his new home only where labor is duly honored and reward is just reward. Let him realize the fact that labor in the South leads just as surely to independence, comfort, and a respectable position there as it does in the North, and the Southern States will soon attract a large and steady stream of European immigration.

PLUCK AND LUCK.

"CONFOUND it!" said Tom, puffing resignedly at his cigar, "from our very birth Bingham and I were always pitted against each other, and he always won all the points. I was always ready for every thing epidemic that was going, and always whining in the contagious stage of something or other, and my aunt Dip, Derrick, who has got the dimonds, hated me. From fourteen to twenty I was a sloven, and a bear besides! Now I'm a dandy (I suppose you know my latest justice to himself), but no tongue-puver; muscle, but a low stature; an ugly phiz, and no small-talk. A likely portrait to win a woman's favor, whether my aunt Slap Derrick's or Mollie Miller's! And Bingham was always what you see him now. I know that he is a coward, and I should not like to say what besides, and yet I catch myself believing in him! And his inevitable luck would make a man believe in it. But the very weather is in a conspiracy with him. The most scowling day brightens for him, and the fiercest sunrise is sure to turn to drizzle before noon. It was always so! And I say, let him take all the cards and end it," tossing his cigar into the grass, as if to light the sacrifice.

Dayton, Tom's friend, listened smiling. He was tolerably well used to such confidences. Besides, though Tom said the language, he felt defiantly there was a spark of battle in his eye. He was not the man to hang on his aunt's lips for the Slap Derrick dimonds, though he was ready enough to admit that they were good things in their way. He was the man to win a fair one, and had something of a woman's instinct, was quick to seize the propitious moment.

"Why not try pluck against luck?" he asked, reading Tom's look.

"By Jove, I will!" answered Tom.

At the time of this conversation all the principals of our story were together at the Rotherbilde House. Tom, his aunt Slap Derrick, his cousin Bingham Dayton, and Mollie Miller; and the position of these human pawns just then was such that Tom's "I will" needed to be potent. It was fair sailing enough for Bingham, who, it was understood, would succeed to the Slap Derrick diamonds. For him thorny aunts and brambly parents discreetly stepped aside. But Tom was another pair of sleeves, thought Mrs. Miller; while Mollie herself thought nothing about it. It was her business to make pretty toilets, and genteelmen might secure her smiles if they could. And for the rest, she was not in love with Bingham—though, to be very honest, she expected to be; and why not with a man who was well-mannered and well-looking? Tom was not to her, "My dear, you had better marry the Slap Derrick diamonds;" but Mollie knew the family mind on the subject, and, with such averse, only as yet she felt quite at liberty to speculate, as she sometimes did when she had nothing better to do, on Tom as a most remarkable type, and how any one of his glances should make her blush. No help here for poor Tom, you see, who had not even conceit to back him; and certainly none from his aunt Slap Derrick, who could never forgive him his low stature, his grey eyes, and his tendency to snubbing him. Nothing but cool audacity—or call it pluck, if you like—with which to fight his cousin's good looks, and good luck, to fight his cousin's good looks, and good luck, and the Slap Derrick diamonds, worth, as we all know, good looks and courage both together. With all these things in his favor Tom came on in the most encouraging manner. He had always his aunt Slap Derrick's shawls or one of Mollie's maiden aunts on his arm. He had been seen to take Mollie after the picnic baskets, and the carriages, and the gipsy fires, and so on, while Bingham kept the ladies in the house. If he had been left to talk with Mollie he met Mrs. Miller half-way, who said, "Oh, Mr. Du Cœur, could you do me a favor? I have left my shawl (or my bonnet, or my basket, as the case might be) in the summer-house, and I am afraid of the dew, in my slipper." To which the short, sturdy, ugly man replied, "Mrs. Miller's third bureau drawer, as she knows, and Tom knows; but be good, for all that, with that shawl, or bonnet, or book in the slipper, run though, and gets back in time to let me Mollie going off on Bingham's arm.

Dayton, who was the stronger, the greater, he thought, than the Slap Derrick diamonds, was bitter enough over these "diamond worshipers," as he called them. But he was sensible.

"I put my head down and take it," he said; "and if you notice, it is those people who do that who win in the end. I don't care so much about my success, or should be, were it not for my feelings. Properly to manage a love affair a man should not be in love with the lady. That is one of the first rules of art. Now I am—in love I mean—and I can't obey the rules of art; and my confounded feelings get in the way. Bingham, and sulk, and all that sort of thing: though I know all the time that it is a mistake to sulk, when nobody cares to notice it. I wish I were sure that my luck would not spoil all as that I shall succeed. Laugh, if you like, but I have been meditating on the subject. I wish I had in me that will buy be triumph; but as the prize is in my hand my luck will cross me again, and I shall lose it."

"Nonsense!" said Dayton. "Stuff!"

"Very good. Wait and see," said Tom; and in the same breath, "Why, what is Miss Miller about?"

That morning the entire party at Rotherbilde had embraced for an excursion to the neighboring town. Tom, determined to throw up his office of shawl-bearer, had walked to the forward car, where he stood talking in the platform to Dayton. Perhaps something besides the shawls was at the bottom of this move. Bingham walked with Mollie, who looked as fresh as a rose in her little hat, and blushed as prettily. But then it was not a pleasant sight for Tom, and he went on in a rage, leaving Aunt Slap Derrick and her bundles to Bingham also. Mrs. Slap Derrick was not the woman to bate one jot of her claims for the "most gifted in the room," which, indeed, was fully occupied with her; and meantime Mollie found that she had left her bag in the waiting-room, and sprang out to get it.

How in an instant, from careless ease and security, we sometimes find ourselves hanging between life and death! Mollie had her little bag at once, and she was determined not to lose it, as it held her watch and chain. She was quick in motion, the bell rang, and the train was in motion, and her mother and Mrs. Slap Derrick screaming for her as she stepped on the platform, and Tom after her. One moment she was trying for a foothold on the steps, the next she was hanging by the rail of the train, clinging desperately to the railing of the car platform, sure of going under the wheels if she released her hold, and not going without, if any power in life could further on. A woman had been cut to pieces there two weeks before. She shocked Mollie, and turned her face quite white, had time to remember that, and then Tom, big Tom, who had made his way to the door, among the rest, and wondered to have dragged there for an eternity, yet it was but an instant, when somebody clasped her about the waist fearlessly, panting and breathing hard, ran desperately with the train, slackening its speed now as her peril was discovered, and somebody's hands were held somebody held her up, stunned and dizzy; Mollie stood in the door; the little knot of men made way for her; and it was Slap Derrick, who had seen it all, seized her hands.

"My poor child! my dear child!" cried Mrs. Slap Derrick. "Oh, Mrs. Miller! thank God that she is safe!"

Mrs. Miller, calmly tying up a parcel, looked up in surprise, then pathetically sobbed.

"Safe! Good Lord! what has been the matter?"

"Are you hurt?" exclaimed Bingham, bustling up. "I was so frightened, Miss Mollie."

"Hurt! frightened!" Mrs. Miller began to grow hysterical. Every body talked together. Mollie leaned back, nervy jarring to that dreadful, remorseless rhythm to which she had been dragged. She was not even curious to know who was her preserver. She was in a sort of mental swoon. When Mrs. Miller asked who had saved her,

"A brakeman, was it not?" she said, faintly, and looking at Bingham. "You saw. I should like to find him, and give him something."

"I—I," stammered, confounded Bingham, hesitating, for he had seen Tom perfectly. "He wore a wide hat; very likely a brakeman, as you say."

"What is that?" cried Mrs. Slap Derrick, sharply. "You do not know, Bingham? I should think you might; I saw him distinctly over your shoulder. It was Tom Du Cœur, Miss Mollie, if you like to know."

"I did not know. I was so shocked. I was trying to get to Mollie myself," muttered Bingham, greatly abashed under that formidable look. "It is all over, which Tom should her "rhinoceros expression."

"Mr. Du Cœur!" repeated Mollie, blushing brightly. She could not tell why, but she was glad that it was Tom. "Oh! Mrs. Slap Derrick! where is he? Why does he not come here? I want to thank him. Where has he gone?"

"In a bad habit of modesty," answered Mrs. Slap Derrick, dryly, which was very true. Besides, Tom did not choose that Mollie should love him, if she ever should him, out of gratitude, and he had himself properly; and when Mollie found him out and seized him he attained, between vexation and shame, to the very sublime art of self-obedience, and actually told the woman that he loved, when she was thanking him for her life with all fervor in her eyes, that "It was nothing. He would have done it for any one."

"Really! you are too flattering!" Mollie could not help but pout at that; but as she looked at him she said to herself that he had saved her, after all, and held out both her hands to him.

"If you say so, I have reason to do so," she said, earnestly. "And I thank you for it with all my heart. I was perched upon that dreadful bag. Those men stood staring at me, and you alone knew what to do. I will always thank you for it. I will always be your grateful friend, Mr. Du Cœur."

Tom turned very pale.

"You have no reason to thank me," he said, holding her hands coldly. "If the wheels had gone over you, I would have thrown myself there."

And now who knows what would have happened next, but just then Tom found Mrs. Miller at his elbow.

"We shall always be grateful, Mr. Du Cœur," commenced that lady, and broke down. She was hysterical now, whenever Mollie's danger was mentioned.

"We are all grateful," put in Bingham, smoothly. "You are sure it was Tom, Miss Laura Dayton Derrick? I—I—but her sight is none of the best. I thought that it was a brakeman."

"Indeed," interposed Mollie, "it was Mr. Du Cœur. I know now." And then she blushed scarlet. She had grown suddenly very shy of "Mr. Du Cœur." "I do not know how to thank him enough," she persisted, bravely.

"Shall I tell you how to thank him?" whispered Tom, suddenly, forgetting his fine theories about not asking for gratitude. "Tell me, if you can with truth, that you are willing to owe me such a debt."

"I am willing," murmured Mollie, very softly, after a moment's hesitation.

Tom went to bed that night in a glow of triumph. He forgot that haunting demon of his—his luck. Though he had not had an opportunity for another word, Mollie's looks more than many words. But his triumph was short lived. Mollie had taken fright, and retreated behind her intrenchments when she was hardly to be seen, and not to be spoken with, alone. She was not angry. When she did lift her eyes to his they were kind enough, very shy, and Tom, who could hardly look at him. Some gulf had suddenly yawned between them; and though she was merry and friendly with every one else, she kept him on the other side of it. They—the whole company—went on a walking-tour, and Mollie would not let him be near her. She kept them on the crossed the brooks, and was mum whenever he approached. And Tom, who knew nothing about women, full of wrath and pride and consternation, to pour his complaints in Dayton's ear.

"I believe she hates me for saving her life," he said, despairingly. "Before, she was civil; now, she won't look at me."

"It strikes me that is not a bad symptom," said Dayton, smiling; "though we shall hardly be able to discuss the question, for here she comes over the stile."

"Here!" Tom turned sharply, and Mollie, who was close behind him, looked greatly disconcerted at seeing him.

"Mamma sent me," she explained. "We have found a house—such a strange place! and we are to have tea there, and so on." Then she said, Mr. Du Cœur, that you were a doctor, and would know what was the matter, and I came back because Mrs. Slap Derrick was afraid to let Mr. Bingham leave her."

"She is afraid lest I should misconstrue even this natural favor," thought Tom, bitterly. "She wishes me to know that she came because she could not help herself."

And he walked beside her, looking so grim that Mollie, who had intended to bring about a better understanding, lost heart, and walked in silence also. So they reached the old house, where the rest of the party were waiting for them —a ruinous old building, with a general air of fallen wretchedness brooding over it. The man of whom Mollie had spoken lay within in a stifling den, destitute even of a window: matted, begrimed, raving, and horrible to look at, as dimly seen in the dark bedroom. Tom made a brief examination, and came out to the expectant party, carefully shutting the door after him.

"Well, what is it?" said every body together.

"Malignant small-pox," answered Tom, coolly.

"Good Heavens!"

It was Bingham who exclaimed, shrinking back as he spoke from Tom's nearest neighborhood.

"Why, we have been here long enough to contract the disease. Aunt! Miss Mollie! pray let me persuade you to come away."

"Thank you," returned the younger lady, without stirring, and still looking at Tom. "But what are you going to do, Mr. Du Cœur?"

"Stay here," said Tom.

"In this dreadful den?"

Tom's face lighted up.

"In this dreadful den a man is dying for want of the commonest care; and I know the people of this country. Neither nor women could be hired to act as his nurse or argued out of their fears. I have no such fears, and it is my duty as a physician."

Mollie cast an appealing look at Mrs. Slap Derrick.

"But how can you live, Mr. Du Cœur?"

"He can not live! Tom, I will not allow it!" exclaimed his aunt.

"I think you would not wish me to leave any human being to a dog's death," answered Tom, resolutely. "And for living, you and Miss Mollie will send me a basket of fresh, the delicacies of the season, and such medicines as I shall order, every day, and Dayton will leave it outside the door."

Mollie came close to him, with the look that she had worn when she had thanked him for her life.

"You are a hero!" she said. "A real hero! and a truly brave man! I shall be proud to remember you in my life as I do you, Mr. Du Cœur. And whatever I can do to help you shall be done."

The next moment she was whisked and comfortabled at home, and Tom stared hastily away; but she could not take back her words. And Tom lived on them through all the weary weeks that were to come. He was true as in the secondest now, and Bingham's luck paled before it. He was not only Mollie's hero, but every body's hero. The packing of his basket was the event of the day. In vain he protested that it was a basket for a sanitorium or a hospital. The ladies had a theory that the more of a good thing the better, and sent him every thing on which they could get their unscrupulous fingers. Mollie could get their unscrupulous fingers. Mollie could be scarcely kept away by itself, in a dish covered with leaves, and a bouquet attached, or what Tom valued more, a note, reading some thing like this:

"Mr. Du Cœur:

"I hope you—How is your gentle? and are you sure you are quite well? And your aunt, Mrs. Slap Derrick, wishes me to say that Mrs. Dr. Jones is quite satisfactory. He never will say any thing but that you are 'jolly,' or 'living like bricks,' or something out of that sort.

M. MILLER."

And though this may not be a model note in style, and certainly was written in a slovenly hand, Tom read it to himself, not the least exacting of persons, would have been satisfied with the reception that Tom gave it, though he was a fastidious fellow. He read it with many small-pox in an envelope, during his whole six weeks of trial.

But the weeks themselves were done at last: Tom's gorilla restored—no great benefit to society in that. He was but a poor, dumb creature, was at last, and Tom was back gaunt and pale. Mollie, who had been most anxious for his coming, when he did come turned shy. She was out-lying house; and now he was close by her he looked formidable. She looked down, and could not find a word to say for herself. She had thanked him, and never called him a hero, never written him any notes. Tom grew desperate, and spoke out.

"Miss Mollie, I was back again with the gorillas."

"Why?" asked Mollie, with a little start.

"Because then you were kind to me. Now you seem to hate me."

"I am sure I do not hate you," answered Mollie, raising her eyes to his; and the eyes and so much that Tom grew bolder.

"But I am not satisfied with that, Mollie. I want you to love me."

Mollie looked up at him quickly, and looked down as quickly, and then she got over the hand bashed into tears; and failing, dropped her head on his shoulder.

"My darling," murmured Tom, in a rapture.

"What!" cried a high voice that made them both start. "Mary Miller! I wonder you are not ashamed of yourself!"

Mrs. Miller had come upon them unawares, and Mollie uttered a faint shriek. Tom put his arm quietly round her waist, and explained that he wished to marry her daughter.

Mrs. Miller, being in a towering rage at the downfall of her designs on the Slap Derrick diamonds, retorted with something about "beggarly scrub-graces."

"And will beggarly I" inquired another shrill voice, Mrs. Slap Derrick coming in in great wrath. "Let me tell you, Madam, that Tom Du Cœur will succeed to three-fourths of the Slap Derrick estate: and Mrs. Tom Du Cœur will wear the Slap Derrick diamonds."

Of course in half an hour every body in the house knew just what Mrs. Miller had said, and Mrs. Slap Derrick had said; and Dayton came, beaming, to congratulate Tom.

Tom smiled faintly.

"I luck has done its work. It is time for my luck, Dayton."

"Stuff!" said Dayton, much vexed.

In the morning Tom was ill. By night he was worse.

"Cold and fatigue," said the surgeons. "Small-pox," hinted the foreboding. "Typhoid," pronounced Dayton.

Typhoid it was. Doctors were brought, and doctors from the first shook their heads. Generally that is as good for the patient as if Death himself had nodded at him. But I really think that Dr. Weisser's terms and hours may be said to have saved Tom's life. Forte music always drive him into a corner, to make him stand at bay. He kindled, as he had done before, at the apparent desperation of his prospects, and vowed that he would get up.

Every body set up a shout of horror. Tom persisted.

"I am convinced," said he, "that it is not typhoid—nervous prostration cold, watching, and bad luck making a last attempt to trip me; and I am not going to be tripped by it; so you need not look as if I was not wanted for Heaven's sake. Death's express. I shall not stay in bed, Aunt Skip Derrick, and I will not be doctored, Mrs. Miller; and ladies, I really crave your pardon, but I am going now to make my toilet."

The last hint was irresistible, and Tom's will achieved victory, leaving him the field. Every body prophesied, by way of revenge, that he was a dead man; but Tom only laughed at them, and got well under their very noses. Of course, he had his wet sat up as an oracle, as well as a hero, and ruled every body, married Mollie, and is consulted by that lady and Mrs. Skip Derrick to this day, as a paragon of men—all thanks to pluck!

LINCOLN AND THE PROCLAMATION OF EMANCIPATION.

[Extract from Vol. II. of DR. DRAPER'S History of the American Civil War, published by HARPER & BROTHERS.]

A DEPRECIATED currency, heavy and steadily increasing taxation, the terrors of a coming military draft, the clamor of the peace party, and, above all, a profound disappointment in the result of Mr. Lincoln's campaign, weighed heavily on the spirit of the nation. More and more clearly was the stern alternative presented to it—emancipation of the slave, or destruction of the Republic.

There is reason to suppose that when Lincoln saw the wreck of McClellan's expedition coming back from the Peninsula, he made up his mind. To repair the dreadful losses of that and Pope's campaign, a large number of men was needed. He reflected that the balance would be equally made to it by adding fighting men in one scale, or by taking black men out of the other. Convincing that summer he had read at a cabinet meeting a draft of a proclamation of emancipation. The Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, suggested completely approving of its character, thought the time inopportune, and that, instead of coming after a disaster, it ought to come after a victory. In this, on consideration, Lincoln agreed. The time for such a proclamation was not when Pope was in view of Washington, and the expulsion of the national authorities from the Capitol itself by no means an improbability. There was a day on which it seemed more likely that the Confederacy would dictate terms than have to submit to them—a day on which it would have been absurd, indeed, for the vanquished President to tell his antagonists, flushed with victory, that he was going to free slaves.

"I made a solemn vow before God," said Lincoln, subsequently, "that if General Lee was driven back from Maryland, I would consider the result by a declaration of freedom to the slaves."

The battle of Antietam was fought, and Lee, driven across the Potomac, retreated into Virginia on the night of the 19th of September. The losses of the South in this sortie had been awful. Mourning was sitting by the fire in many Southern fireside. And now Lincoln remembered the vow he had made. "Whatever shall appear to be God's will, I will do."

"I claim not to have controlled events, but confess plainly that events have controlled me." Such was his public declaration a short time before his death. He added, "The condition of the nation is not what any party or any man expected or desired." With that clear-sightedness which seemed to possess him more and more thoroughly as he approached his end, he affirmed, "It is the work of God." Recognizing during that God not only reigns, but governs, he saw, in the events transpiring before him, that there was something more than the wishes and will of man. In every phase of the conflict he perceived the arbitrament of a Higher Power. Not as a delusion of fancy, but as a reality, he recognized the dread alternative presented to his nation—do justice or die. To his surrounding friends he pointed out that, though the fight now was pouring forth her blood like water, and wounding treasuries of money, success was denied. The rebellion he had gone to prevent by John Hunter had been confronted by the horrible catastrophe of the Chickahominy, and by the repulse of Pope into the fortifications of Washington. Once more a day of grace had been granted at Antietam, but that only half regarded. The stern summons had been again renewed from the cannon that were permitted to sweep off fourteen thousand men at Harper's Hill, and from Lincoln's army across the Rappahannock. "What can I," said Lincoln, "that I should contest the will of God?"

From the rivers of Virginia to the Mexican confines of the Republic arose a mournful wail—How long, O Lord! how long! It came from the weary laborer, leaning on his hoe in the cotton-field under the noontide sun—it came through the moaning midnight forests, solemn arches above their multitudinous inarticulate sounds—it came from children torn from their parents, from wives and husbands parted at the auction block, from mothers in despair, from strong men fainting under the lash, from the aged whose heads were frosted by time. In their quaint prayers the Africans talk to God as a man talks face to face with his friend. Slavery had made His their friend. By the flickering fires of their cabins they stealthily spelt out the Bible to see what He had promised to them. It was the dreadful lot that had caused Jefferson, himself a slave-owner, to ejaculate solemnly with his accustomed piety, "I tremble for the wrath of God. For who shall escape when from the hand of Eternal Justice her scales have dropped as matters—when from her hero the balance has been raised that her uncovered and angry eyes may gaze upon unutterable wrong—when her uplifted arm, writing with indignation, shall be ready to let a blow that shall make a whole continent tremble!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE general belief that August is a hotter month than July is not sustained by facts. The average temperature during August for the last forty years has not exceeded 58 degrees, according to observations, while the average heat of July during the same period has been about 67 degrees. During the heated term in July last the thermometer is said to have risen higher than for fourteen years. The present diversity in reports respecting the position of the mercury is due to a variety of circumstances. Of course every body agrees that the thermometer should be in the shade; but many other influences besides the direct rays of the sun affect the mercurial column. And in a hot day every body experiences a certain sort of radiation from an overheating house which the thermometer will run in the particular place where he himself is obliged to spend his time. Then he knows exactly how uncomfortable he feels.

According to the report of the Registrar of Vital Statistics 142 persons died in New York during the week ending July 18, the third week of excessive heat. An usual, but not extraordinary, number. Of course the city suffered the most; and the mortality among children under five years of age was very great.

A correspondent of the Liverpool Evening Post says of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency: "Seymour has been on Pompey's pillar, in Alexandria, a village distinguished for a massacre of Spanish and French by the Indians as far back as 1669, and for the discovery of a meteor there, now in the Albany museum, bearing the date of Leo X., year 1520. When posterity digs up the Seymour pillar, what will be said of the principles it will conclude that it flourished about the year of our Lord, and that its 'Governor' was?"

A new reservoir has been completed at Worcester, called the "Hunt Reservoir," and the water has been let into it. The main reservoir is about two hundred feet higher than the city, and the pressure of water is so great that the object sought by the new Hunt reservoir was needed to regulate the flow of water. It is constructed of about two million of gallons.

In times past it has been almost impossible to combine lead chemically with zinc; but the discovery has been announced that the two can be united by a chemical combination can be made. This discovery is destined to cause a great change in the foreign and domestic white-lead trade. Manufactories will be soon established, and this new pigment has been introduced into the market. It is said to be very durable for both outside and inside work, grows whiter, does not crack or peel, and resists the action of weather and water.

It is stated that ornamental fountains are soon to go into operation. It is the intention to have getting bad wives and women against getting bat husbands.

The Cartwright Knapsack Company is building quite a reputation, and remarkable cures are reported.

The special luxury at St. Albans, Vermont, is said to be fricasseed eggs. The cooks vary in the style to please the palate of lovers of such delicacies.

A novel philanthropic enterprise has been undertaken by a number of wealthy citizens of the city to aid the industrious poor, who desire cleanly abodes, their air, and their surroundings, for themselves and families. A farm has been purchased of more than 400 acres at Great Neck, Long Island, and immediately on the water line in Suffolk County, about six miles east of Flushing depot and about forty-five miles from the city of New York, which it is considering, provides as great advantages for the object in view. About seven-eighths of the farm is said to have a good arable soil—the remainder is woodland, and the location is beautifully diversified by hill and dale. The farm has many well-protected building sites. Various buildings are in process of erection; the farm is moderately stocked, and suitable provision is made for water. The hope is that soon employment may be given to as many persons as will be found applicants to collect in that particular locality. Schools will be established and the Church Extension Society, according to the settlement is St. Johnland, and Rev. Dr. W. A. Muhlenberg is the chief proprietor.

The report is that the city of Berlin has to pay over $20,000 damages to St. John's Church, caused by fire kindled by fire-works. A rather expensive "exhibition piece."

Remedies, rest or supposed, for hydrophobia, are given to the public in almost every issue. Such a philanthropic individual is so certain that he has the means of preventing any evidence of the disease, that he offers to let any mad dog try their teeth upon his arm. This man says he has been bitten several times by rabid animals, and always cured himself by making a strong salt pickle, rubbing the wound with it for an hour, and then binding on a sufficient quantity of salt on it.

Babies are fashionable in Paris, and good-looking, nicely-dressed infants are let out at four dollars an hour.

A new invention is announced, called a "Speaker-extinguisher." It is especially designed for public entertainments, and will, if it doubtless proves quite as popular that it will be needful to introduce it into churches. The "extinguisher" consists of a large wooden cone, which fits into a proper place. The plate is fixed on the floor, and the cone fastened above by a chain of sufficient length to admit of its descending to the groove. It is so arranged that at the end of five minutes it falls, and becomes almost straight. Every speaker is required to stand upon the plate, and informed of the time he can employ. If he exceeds five minutes the cone falls and shuts the fellow under, so that he can't extricate himself or be heard."

Binghamton, New York, is a handsome city, and one to which a great deal of business is done. But the chief interest of the place centers in the State Inebriate Asylum, which is prominently located on a high hill, and is a very elegant building of white stone. It is not the only insane asylum connected with the United men. Quite an interesting course of lectures was sustained last winter wholly by the inmates of the asylum, for almost every class and profession is represented there, and there are many literary men who, when in a right state of mind and body, are eloquent speakers.

New York and other large cities are anathematised as being cess of crime and rascality. The dwellers in cities are depraved enough, no doubt; but it is reliably stated that full seventy-five per cent. of the crime committed in the largest cities is by non-residents, and that the most objectionable places of amusement and sin subsist chiefly on patronage from the rural districts. The fact should not be overlooked by those who regard New York as a modern Sodom, and questions whether there is any thing good in it.

About 1500 buildings have been erected in Washington during the past year. Before the rebellion the population of this city numbered about 63,000; now it is said to have a population of 130,000, including the wards of Georgetown.

It is estimated that about $60,000,000 lead pencils are used every year. In Germany, where the pencil trade is most flourishing, there are seventy manufactories, the largest of which is at Stein, kept by the Faber family. Here 1,200 hands, mostly females with their father and grandfather having been engaged in the business, and his been carried on until the same name of Faber, as a pencil maker, is renowned. There are several manufactories in this country, where nearly all the work is done by machinery; but in Germany the pencils are mostly made by hand.

Perhaps one of the most novel applications of electricity has been made by Robert Houdin, who lives in the village of Saint Gervais, a short distance from the city of Blois, France. A visitor presenting himself before the door sees a gilt plate bearing the name of Robert Houdin, together with a small gilt knocker. He raises this, and no matter how feeble the blow, is instantly made aware of it by a loud, soaring through the mansion, announces his presence. When the servant has touched a button placed in the hall the chime ceases, the door of entrance is thrown back, and the name of Robert Houdin disappears from the door, and in its place appears the word "entrez" in white enamel. The visitor passes upon the door and enters; it closes upon a spring behind him, and he can not depart without permission. By a complicating number of chimes which are sounded the number of visitors is announced, and as each stranger arrives at the gate, the movement of the gate is announced at the house. Robert Houdin, by means of electric communication with the house. The carrier, previously instructed, knows the name of the visitor and the matter together; then adds the letters, one by one. Each addition sounds the chime. And when he is desired to take away letters, he touches a second button, of a special kind, which warns him that they are ready. An electric current regulates the clock and the watches of Mr. Houdin's study clock being the standard. Every morning this clock sends forth, by means of wires, electric impulses to awaken three persons. But in addition, the impulses awaken them also, by continuing to sound until the circuit is broken by means of a small key placed at the further end of the room. To do this the sleeper must rise, for the key is out of the object sought. The temperature of the green-house is also recorded by electricity, so that the gentleman can not neglect to water it without his master knowing all about it; and he evidently regards Houdin as a sorcerer.

There are many American sculptors who have taken up their residence in Florence. Powers, in the Via Nazionale, and Hart, in the Via Cavour. Hart's studio comprises five or six large halls, in which a large number of statues and busts are constantly employed. The cast of his busts and statues, and the mysterious block of marble which are being wrought out, form a tolerably complete gallery of his labors as a sculptor. One of his most recent works represents a tall, beautiful Indian woman at the moment of meeting with a weary(ness of body and limb which indicates that the end of her long journey is near. Her head is turned to one side, as if listening to the sound of pursuit. The face expresses both fear and pain, not sharp and desperate, but dulled by the weariness of a long pilgrimage.

Since he first came to Florence, in 1858, Powers has made fully five times as much money as he spends a number of ideal works, all of which have been repeated in marble many times. Hart, for instance, enjoys such a remarkable popularity that it has been reproduced in marble more than eighty times.

The Italian peasant wears more than one hundred and fifty manufactories of India rubber articles is American, and Europe, employing from three to five hundred operatives, and consuming more than ten millions of pounds of gum per annum. Yet the business is conducted in a way so carefully it is increasing. Nevertheless, there is no probability of the demand for India rubber ever being exhausted. The belt of land around the globe, five hundred miles each side of the Equator, contains inexhaustible forests; and they can be tapped, it is said, for twenty successive seasons. Only four per cent. of these trees have been counted in a tract of country thirty miles long and eight wide. Each tree yields about three table-spoonfuls daily, but the trees are so large together that a man can gather the sap of eighty in a day.

The discovery of the berries of coffee as a beverage is ascribed to the superior of a monastery in Arabia, who, desirous of preventing the monks from sleeping at their nocturnal services, made them drink the infusion of coffee, having heard the shepherds of the country say that they observed their flocks were more lively after browsing on the fruit of the plant. Its reputation spread through the adjacent countries, and in about two hundred years it had reached Paris. A single plant brought there in 1714 became the parent stock of the West India coffee plantations of the West Indies. The Dutch introduced it into Java and the East Indies, and the French and Spanish all over South America and the West Indies.

The lady waxed wrathy, and the wag vamoosed.

HOW TO SLEEP IN CHURCH.

Assuming that it is a duty, let us consider the manner of performing it. Like all other Christian practices, there ought to be uniformity in the manner.

1. It is an improper manner of performing this duty to nod, and for the plain reason that the nodding attracts too much attention. We are every where taught to avoid ostentatious display in our worship. The Pharisees were condemned for praying at corners of the street, that they might be seen of men. On the same principle the nodding worshiper is condemned, for he is making too public a display of his devotions.

2. Again it is proper to enure to the performance of this duty—partly for the foregoing reasons; but mainly because it is a direct infraction of the golden rule. Suppose, for instance, that your next-door neighbor is asleep; by your snoring he will be disturbed, probably awakened. This is not doing unto others as you would they should do to you.

3. It is wrong to injure one's health while offering worship; and all physicians admit that to sleep with the head thrown back and the mouth wide open is liable to produce sore throat and bronchial troubles. Besides sometimes get into the mouth on such occasions, to the great inconvenience of both the delicate membranes and cause horrible ostentatious coughing, which is very injurious to health.

4. To sleep with head resting on the arms of the pew-chair and the face buried up to the eyes in the coat, is the most improper way of offering a worship. First, because it is done to excess in health, and, mainly, because it is a direct violation of the Scriptures, which command us to eat only such as shall make that men profit by our example. In this case it is impossible to know whether the individual worshiper is asleep or awake. It is a positive case of lukewarmness—neither the one thing nor the other.

"Patrick O'Flinn," called out the captain.

"Here, yer Honor!" promptly responded Patrick, with the usual brogue.

"How long do you wear a shirt?" thundered the officer.

"Twenty-eight inches long," was the rejoinder.

IN BROADWAY.

IN THE BOWERY.

"UP AMONG THE NINETIES."—[SEE PAGE 521.]

"THE VILLAGE DÉPOT."—FROM A PAINTING BY E. L. HENRY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.]

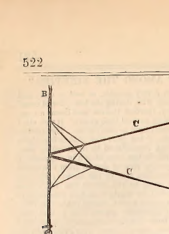
"UP AMONG THE NINETIES."

HE was a very sensible, as well as witty and clever man, who, during the late "torrid term" in this city, thanked Heaven that it was a term, and found its natural limit at last. It was, alas! the unnatural limit to many lives. That terrible July week of hot days and suffocating nights will be long remembered by its mortality rate. Nothing like it has been known in a quarter of a century—the rate of deaths from sun-stroke was greater than that of the cholera; the city mortality usual to the season was more than doubled; and the deaths from heat were twice as great as was ever known, except in the year 1866, and was considerably greater than in that year. The fatal heat—the close atmosphere—penetrated every where, and all classes were affected by it; and sun-strokes were as frequent within doors as in the open air.

We gave lately a full account of the horrible scenes at the Morgue and the hospitals. They were not the only places affected by the consequences of the heat, but the public places of amusement and the churches were deserted; the streets were promenaded by gentlemen in their shirt-sleeves; the cooler spots were crowded to suffocation; the residents of Fifth Avenue stole a lesson from the denizens of the Five Points, and made evening lounging-places and even bedrooms of their house-tops. One of our artists (probably struck by an idea rather than the sun, and drawing inspiration rather than disease from the heat-poisoned atmosphere) has happily illustrated the "torrid term" in our engraving on page 500, from another and more pleasant point of view than that which we adopted last week. The picture at the same time presents most admirably the contrast existing between Broadway and the Bowery, those two great arteries of the city, filled almost to bursting with such different blood. Every citizen of New York will recognize instantly the accuracy of the picture; nothing could more clearly convey to the minds of the thousands of distant readers, who are always wishing to know more about New York, the vast difference between the two great streets, and the two great classes of the metropolis. Each scene is a very frequent one; but you never see the Broadway character in the Bowery, and the Bowery waifs do not deign to lunch on Broadway. The elegant saloon and the stylish dresses are never seen in the Bowery, and, thanks in part to an efficient police, the nuisances of street eating-counters are not often found on Broadway.

THE MARYLAND FLOOD.

ADDITIONAL particulars of the Maryland flood indicate that the disaster was much more serious, both to life and property, than was at first supposed. We give on page 517 several illustrations of the scenes at Baltimore and Ellicott City which, with those presented last week, will give the reader an idea of the horrors of the flood.

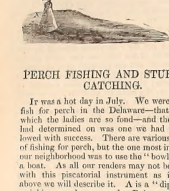


Our first engraving shows the scene on Jones's Falls at Hillen Street, Baltimore, on the second evening after the subsidence of the flood. The drawing was taken from just above Hillen Street, looking down Jones's Falls, as the usually narrow and shallow stream is called, toward the accumulated debris of the flood at the bridge across Guy Street.

The engraving at the bottom of the same page represents the scene at the same time on Harrison Street, through which, it will be remembered, the water ran in great fury. At the time the sketch was made order had been restored, but such order was never seen before. The streets were filled with broken and muddy furniture, the awnings were hung with grass, driftwood, and various other substances which had floated down with the angry tide; the cellars of the houses were filled with water; the basement floors were uninhabitable, and the residents were confined to their upper chambers.

The other illustration shows the scene of the greatest destruction, at Ellicott City. It was on the east bank of the river that the flood was most destructive. The greater part of the buildings destroyed were there situated, and all the persons whose lives were lost were dwellers in this ill-fated section. So complete is the destruction on that side that those entering the town in that direction scarcely recognize it as once forming a material part of the flourishing city. In all thirty-two buildings were swept away, thirty of which were dwellings, and the lives of forty-three persons are known to have been lost. The entire row of houses between the turnpike bridge and the Patapsco Mills were all swept away. The most of the persons whose lives were lost were occupants of houses in this row.

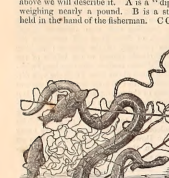
The Granite cotton-mill, belonging to BENJAMIN DEFORD, of Baltimore, an immense structure, erected in the most substantial manner at a cost of $50,000, was among the most valuable buildings destroyed. The ruins of this mill are shown on the left of our engraving. All the employés in the factory escaped, except MATHIAS M'CAULEY, an old man, employed as a cloth-packer, who perished with the building.



Next in point of loss was that sustained by the Patapsco flour-mills. CHARLES A. GAMBRILL'S lower flour-mill was entirely swept away, there being scarcely a vestige left to mark where it stood. WILLIAM STELL and another man, WILLIAM SNYDER, were in the mill at the time, and with its ruins were carried down the stream. STELL was subsequently rescued at the Relay House, six miles below. His body was badly cut and bruised by coming in contact with the floating debris. The upper mill was also materially damaged, the northwest corner being washed out, and all the machinery on the lower floor, together with a large quantity of flour, etc., carried away. The bridge belonging to the mills across the Patapsco, connecting with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, was swept away.

THE BOWLINE.

PERCH FISHING AND STURGEON CATCHING.



IT was a hot day in July. We were going to fish for perch in the Delaware—that sport of which the ladies are so fond—and the plan we had determined on was one we had often followed with success. There are various methods of fishing for perch, but the one most in vogue in our neighborhood was to use the "bowline" from a boat. As all our readers may not be familiar with this piscatorial instrument as illustrated above we will describe it. A is a "dipsy lead," weighing nearly a pound. B is a stout cord, held in the hand of the fisherman. C C are slender ends of whalebone, to the extremities of which are fastened long, outgut snoods, E E, hooking two or three hooks each. Upon the delicate elasticity of the "bow" (as the whalebones are called), much of the success of the fisherman depends. Sometimes the bows are in one piece and bent at an angle of about 90°, but are often in two parts, each about fifteen inches long, and joined at the angle for convenience in carrying. The bow is supported and steadied above and below, as is shown in the drawing, and should hang almost horizontally, about ten inches above the lead. The tide, carrying out the snoods and hooks, causes them to float near the bottom of the river, and at such a distance from the rest of the apparatus that the fish are not led to suspect the existence of deception; while the whole arrangement, in a well made bowline, is such that the slightest nibble will be felt by the forefinger of the fisherman. Frequently six fish will be hauled up at a time, as often as the line can be baited and lowered. Now there is no doubt that to pull up a perch on several or each of the hooks is very pleasant and encouraging, but if one of the fish happens to be an eel the case is widely different, and it must be got off the line quickly and decisively, or such a "mess" will ensue as may put an end to one's fishing for an hour. The appearance of a line, if an eel is not instantly removed, is something like that in the cut. Add to the trouble of disentanglement the fact that every thing is covered with slime from the body of the unfortunate anguilla, and the comfort of the situation can be imagined. A heavy knife or small hatchet is very useful when the eel can not be detached by the dextrous jerk known to experienced fishermen. As to the bait there are various kinds in use. Shad roe is excellent, but only useful when the biting is very lively, for it easily washes off the hook. Sturgeon roe is also used, and various other things, but for general fishing nothing is more reliable for perch than dung-worms. They are found in barn-yards, in moist places, and should be red, with yellow rings, and very lively. Common earthworms may answer to cover the hook when there is nothing else, but they are chiefly affected by those fish that are found on muddy bottoms. The place where the boat should be anchored is of the greatest importance. Perch are generally found upon sand "bars," where the water is not much over ten feet deep at high tide, and the fishermen are very careful to get over the exact spot where they know the fish are generally to be found. After the boat is quietly anchored, those who know the most take their seats in the stern, which is by far the best place for successful sport. We have seen a man in the stern catching fish as fast as he could haul them up, while another, comfortably seated in the bow, had scarcely ever a nibble. The reason is plain, for the farther from the boat the lines are the more likely the fish are to approach them; and those from the bow are carried under the boat, while those from the stern are floated out some distance by the tide, which is generally strong enough to carry the lead eight or ten feet before it touches bottom. We have been out with amateurs who sneered at the efforts of more experienced men to find the right spot at which to anchor. "Here is the river, and the fish are in it," said they. "Let's anchor any where and go to work." But they knew but little of the habits of the fish they were after, being even that they had the bad taste to lunch on worms and often came to grief in consequence of indulging their appetites. While over a sandbank, at the right depth of water and phase of tide, perch may be caught in abundance, so at a few yards' distance, among reeds, weeds, and mud, there will be nothing but eels and a few cat-fish (which latter, however, are well worth catching). The position illustrated below is not uncommon. As may be easily deduced, it is better to anchor a little above the bank if the tide is strong.

A MESS.

The best time for perch-fishing is during the ebb-tide. In the flood and high tides they may be taken near shore, among the spatterdocks, with pole and cork-line. It is generally understood that the earlier in the morning the tide begins to ebb the better the sport.

We will not now describe how we reached the proper place, how we anchored and fished, and what tenderness luck we had. These things we must merely mention, and proceed to tell how that about three o'clock we concluded, as the tide was no longer suitable, to go up a creek on the other side of the river and try for cat-fish.

ANCHORING ANY WHERE.

With this intention we pulled up the anchor and rowed leisurely toward the Pennsylvania shore. When we were about a quarter of a mile from the shore, and pulling gently at the aft oar, we saw rise swiftly up from the depths, ten feet into the air, and but half an oar's length distant, a great, white, shining apparition! In another instant a great sturgeon fell into the boat! Seven feet long he was, and terribly frightened; and he tossed and rolled and lashed his tail, so that it seemed as if there were no way we should certainly have been introduced into the sturgeon's element almost as quickly as he was into ours. But the stout fishing-line was strong enough and strong enough to hold a raging sturgeon; and so it held him safely, and he raged in vain. For an instant we sat in silence. The surprise and fright was so sudden that we only stared at the great fish, which, now having wedged his head under the seat, began to lash his tail and body about in a fearful manner. From their position in the stern of the boat they were in imminent danger of being knocked overboard every time that immense tail swept by them, which it did at about the rate of thirty times a minute. Crowding back as far as they could get themselves, they held up their feet so as to be out of the arc described by the sturgeon's tail. We soon began to feel the necessity of acting, for we expected every moment that, with his body for a lever and his tail for a fulcrum, the sturgeon would wrench off the seat under which he was endeavoring to squeeze himself, and thus injure the boat. But this danger was prevented action, those in the stern could only shout "Knock him in the head!" Another—a novice—hastily put on his coat, and seizing a fish-basket, seemed to be actuated by the intention of getting out and going immediately home. However, he stopped, and, apparently changing his mind, sat down again, still tightly grasping his effects.

Therefore it was that the man in the bow was the only one on whom we could rely. He was ready for any thing. "Take an oar and kill him!" we shouted; and seizing one, and striding across the boat, in front of the prostrate fish, he rapidly, and with all his might, began to ram the creature's head with the handle of the heavy oar, holding it nearly perpendicularly, so as to get the full effect. Most of the mighty blows struck fairly; but as the fish's head was rounded, and very slippery, those strokes which slid off came with their full force on the bottom of the boat. In about a minute he had a hole in the sturgeon's head and a crack in the bottom planks of the boat. When we saw the water coming in we shouted to him to stop. But no; his blood was up; the sturgeon was now decidedly dead; and until he was—whang! bang! crack! crash! In a few minutes the apertures in both the boat and the sturgeon's head were sufficiently enlarged; and perceiving that the fish was nearly dead, and that the boat was nearly swamped, the mighty hammer ceased to descend.

As we had no time to spare, if we wished to reach the shore before the boat should fill with water, the paddles at the stern let down their feet and passed their disabled enemy; and four oars being manned, we ran the boat ashore at the mouth of the creek before she had time to swamp. There we hauled up, and examined into our condition. The boat and the sturgeon were alike uninjured. The latter, however, showed that he was not as easily defeated as we supposed; for on attempting to handle him he began to flounder about in such a way as to show that he had enough life in him to give us trouble yet, particularly as he seemed desirous of squeezing his way through the bow of the boat, where he would interfere with our rowing. However, we tied him to the seat in such a way as to keep him there for the short time he had to live; and then, after resting and congratulating ourselves upon our good luck in securing the fish, and escaping with so little damage, we concluded to row to our starting-place, which we thought could be done by keeping more about continuous bailing. It proved hard work, but we reached the tavern in safety, and astonished the inhabitants of the village by our extraordinary haul. By the time the great fish had had ropes attached to him and had been hauled on shore, and we had collected our lines, baskets, etc., the boat was filled with water up to her gunwales. The sturgeon measured several inches over seven feet in length, and was estimated to weigh, at the least, two hundred pounds.

Such adventures as this of ours are not of common occurrence, especially more than fifty years ago the same thing happened to the writer's father and his brother, as they were rowing across the Delaware, a few miles above where we were fishing; but they did not secure the sturgeon, and the brother's arm was broken. The fishermen told us that though these fish very often spring out of water, near their boats, they seemed perfectly able to avoid coming nearer than was safe to themselves and the boatmen; but our man asserted that they were so much worse of late years than they had been when he was young that he was afraid to go out alone, for he considered that they made entirely too close shaves in their gymnastic performances.

A GREAT SOLAR ECLIPSE.

On the 17th of August, of this year (1868), there will occur the most remarkable solar eclipse that has taken place within historic time, or that will take place for many hundreds of years. A black shadow upward of 140 miles in diameter, surrounded by a penumbra 4000 miles wide, will sweep from the eastern parts of Africa across the Arabian Sea, the Indian peninsula, and the East Indian Archipelago, a distance of more than 8000 miles. The Royal and the Astronomical Societies of Great Britain have sent out expeditions, well supplied with telescopes, spectroscopes, polariscopes—in fact, with all the appliances of modern astronomical science—to take advantage of so favorable an opportunity for obtaining an answer to the interesting questions respecting solar physics which have been suggested by the phenomena of former eclipses. The Russian Government has sent an expedition to Aden, almost the nearest point at which the eclipse will be visible as a total one. The French Government sends out M. Janssen, the eminent observer, at the head of a well-appointed expedition. The Pope sends out Father Secchi. Mr. Pogson, the superintendent of the Government observatory at Madras, will also take part in the work of observing the eclipse. He has been supplied by Mr. Huggins, the eminent spectroscopist, with instruments for analyzing the light from the corona and the colored prominences. A particular interest is attached to the inquiry in consequence of the remarkable discoveries which have been made during the past few years by direct examination of the solar orb. The shifting motion of the solar spots; their strange periodicity; the singular association which exists between this periodicity and the periodicity of terrestrial magnetic variations; the suspected influence of the planets upon the solar atmosphere; these and many other singular discoveries await interpretation, and a strong impression prevails among astronomers that the solution of these problems will be hastened if the observations of the great eclipse should prove successful. Every thing seems favorable—the regularity of the Indian climate; the long range of the inhabited country traversed by the shadow; the careful preparation which has been made for spectroscopic observation, and for taking photographic views of the phenomena presented during the totality. All these circumstances, and the exceptional character of the eclipse itself, combine to afford promise of interesting and important discoveries.

SHANNON'S MODEL.

IMMEDIATELY to the right of the space in the handsome gallery of the Academy of Design allotted to water-colors there has been, since the opening night of this Annual Exhibition, a huge vacant space. The fact that the position is one of the best lighted in the room makes visitors, who are not wholly ignorant of the troubles of "hanging committees," wonder why it is not filled. Some of the invited guests, who were present on the opening night, and who remember the scene which occurred in front of the large painting catalogued "No. 123. Venus Rising from the Sea," which hung there for that single evening, may be able to explain why it hangs there no longer, and it may be they are aware of the romance connected therewith; but few even of these can have heard the particulars of the final dénouement of this singular family history. Hence I tell it.

In the spring of 1865 Mr. Thomas Shannon, an artist of by study, and, throwing himself on the lounge with a fatigued air, exclaimed:

"Well, congratulate me!"

"On what?"

"Work is over, and I am ready at last for my two years' holiday."

"Your work is about to begin, I suppose you mean."

"No, no, I say. It is over, I tell you. Oh! you don't know, my dear fellow, the drudgery of talking commissions; the settlement of moneymatters; the dilution of terms; the closing of bargains with drafts and checks which I can't understand. Painting the pictures is nothing. That is the luxury and pleasure of my life—the labor I delight in. Painting is pleasure."

But, to be more brief, Shannon explained that the commission which he had sought had been obtained, and he was authorized to make one large equestrian portrait, two large paintings illustrative of mythological subjects, and several from sketches of war incidents and American scenery. Among them was one of "Venus Rising from the Sea," for Mr. Gideon L. Vanderwater of this city, a gentleman of culture and wealth, well known by the artists as a liberal patron, and admired by them as a sensible and critical connoisseur of the fine arts. The artist was very wisely left uninstructed in his treatment of the rather hackneyed theme; a handsome sum was named as the price of the picture, and the privilege of exhibiting it before its delivery to the purchaser was also claimed and granted.

It is not necessary to narrate at this point the incidents of Shannon's two and a half years' stay in Rome, or to notice in detail the result of his labors. Only one of the incidents of that residence, and only one of the pictures painted by him, have aught to do with this history. The incident will be mentioned in its proper place; the picture was the one ordered by Mr. Vanderwater, and which, as I have before stated, hung for a single night in the Academy of Design, New York, catalogued "No. 123. Venus Rising from the Sea. T. B. Shannon."

Unfortunately for me, as the narrator of this story, I did not arrive at the Academy of Design on the opening night of the Exhibition of 1868 until a late hour of the evening. I am compelled to give the facts of the occurrences as that evening from the statement made to me by Mr. Shannon.

The painting arrived from Europe but a few days before the opening of the Exhibition, and was hung immediately without being previously shown to Mr. Vanderwater. It was, therefore, only after being there displayed that Mr. Vanderwater saw it.

He entered the Academy on the evening in question in company with his sister and his youngest daughter, his wife and eldest daughter being at this time in Europe. Soon after entering the room he descried Mr. Shannon, and making his way through the crowd he arrested him and welcomed him home again in very warm terms. At the end of the conversation Miss Vanderwater, taking Mr. Shannon's arm, joined with her father in begging the artist to guide them to the picture in which they were all interested—either as painter or purchaser. Shannon might have consistently declined in the mixed crowd present, all of whom could not know the circumstances of the case and the relations of the parties to himself as far as the picture was concerned, but having no false modesty, and caring little for the opinion of those of the crowd who did not know him, and not fearing that of those who did, he acted as the guide of Mr. Vanderwater and the ladies, and escorted them to the picture.

On first looking at the painting there came from Mr. Vanderwater and his fair companions simultaneous cries, not of admiration, but astonishment. Miss Vanderwater dropped the arm of the artist, and convulsively clasping that of her father, pointed nervously to the picture and whispered in his ear. His sister made similar movements, and a hurried exchange of whispers was had between the two ladies. Mr. Vanderwater passed his hands before his eyes, readjusting his eye-glasses as if fearful they had deceived him; and then, after a few seconds of observation of the picture, he turned full upon Mr. Shannon, who stood slightly in the back-ground. A number of the promenaders, attracted by the strange manner of Mr. Vanderwater and the ladies, had gathered near by, and now observed with evident interest the scene enacted before the picture.

At length Mr. Vanderwater spoke, addressing himself to Mr. Shannon in curt but still impassioned phrases, in which the emotion he felt was smothered but not concealed:

"The face of your Venus is not a conception of your own?" he asked.

Mr. Shannon did not answer.

"It is a portrait?" continued Mr. Vanderwater, still interrogatively.

Still Mr. Shannon did not answer. He afterward confessed to me that he was somewhat surprised by the questions.

"Come, Sir," continued Mr. Vanderwater, "you must answer. You had a model for that face—and figure."

"Yes," answered Shannon—"yes, I had a model."

"Who?"

"I beg pardon, Mr. Vanderwater; that you have no right to ask."

"But I do ask—I will know—I have a right."

"When you have proved the right I may answer the question."

"That is too easily proved, I fear. Here!" he exclaimed, seizing and opening a locket which hung around his daughter's neck, "do you see this? That is her portrait."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Shannon, looking at the face in the locket. "How came you by this?"

"It is the same then?"

"The same? yes. But how here—how came you with it?"

"Easily enough, Sir. The lady—your model, Sir," with a sneer and curl of his lip, "is my wife."

Before Shannon could speak Mr. Vanderwater turned, and said:

"You shall hear from me again." And full of rage the old man left the room, bearing the ladies on his arms, and endeavoring as best he could, but with little success, to conceal the emotion and excitement under which he was laboring.

Shannon was utterly dumfounded by the dénouement, and I found him on entering the Academy, ten minutes after this occasion, endeavoring to reconcile the conflicting facts. He at once informed me of the incident—the simultaneous recognition by Mr. Vanderwater, his sister and daughter, of the remarkable portrait, the statement of Mr. Vanderwater that the model was his wife; the possession by him of a photograph of the lady, and yet the impossibility of her being, as he had asserted, his wife.

He suddenly turned to me, and said:

"Has Mr. Vanderwater been twice married?"

"No," I answered.

"Then his wife, if the mother of the young lady I met this evening, is a woman of forty or more."

"About forty-two, I should say. She married young."

"Then it can not be her. But, pshaw! what am I thinking of? Of course she can not be his wife, as—"

He hesitated, and I asked,

"Why?"

"It's of no consequence. She is a young woman, not over nineteen."

"Did you explain this?"

"I had not time. He left me so abruptly."

"You can of course satisfy him that the lady is not his wife."

"I can at least assure him so, for I never saw Mrs. Vanderwater in my life."

"Yet she has been for a year past in Europe—the last winter in Rome."

"Singular, isn't it? Nevertheless, my model was not Mrs. Vanderwater."

"Who was she?"

"A young Italian girl whom I met en route to Florence in 1865, when I was going to Rome. She was alone—in trouble—evidently flying from some one. I protected her, and she accompanied me to Rome."

"Where you set her up in business as a model, and otherwise protected—"

"Stop, Harry; no jokes on that subject."

"I beg pardon, my boy, but—"

"I can tell you no more than this."

"Will that satisfy Vanderwater?"

"To tell you the truth, my dear fellow, I don't care whether it does or not. I shall explain no further."

On the following day I saw Mr. Vanderwater. I was not authorized by Shannon to do so, but I presumed on our long friendship—though somewhat cooled since his return from Rome, some other friend having won some of his affection—to act in his interest. Mr. Vanderwater gave me a warmer reception, on my announcing my business, than I had expected, and at once took me into his library.

"I had thought to send to you for Mr. Shannon's address," he said.

I named his hotel. He had usually stopped at my house; but on his return he had gone to a quiet hotel in the city, and had declined to make my house his home as usual.

"Thank you. I would prefer to communicate with him through you, if you are in any way authorized to act for him in the matter of our business arrangements."

"But I am not," I answered.

"Then, will you act for me? I am desirous of closing our agreement for this picture. I am ready to pay the balance due him, and will make him a liberal allowance in addition to the sum agreed on, if he will renounce the privilege of exhibiting it further."

"Under the circumstances, I can promise that he will consent to the removal; but he will decline any consideration for doing so."

"Thank you. Will you see him, give him this check—filling it up for the amount you can agree on as right, you acting for me—and obtain his consent to the withdrawal of the picture from the Academy?"

I did so. I saw Shannon, paid the balance, closed the account, and carried his transfer of the picture to Mr. Vanderwater.

The same day the picture was removed from the Academy, and passed into the hands of Mr. Vanderwater. What disposition was made of it at that time I do not know.

As we left the building Mr. Vanderwater requested me to go with him to his residence, as he had a second and more serious communication to make through me to Mr. Shannon. We got into a cross-town car, which was passing the Academy at the moment, and started for his house.

As we were making the sharp curve in front of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, at Madison Square, I was suddenly roused from some meditations into which I had fallen by a sharp, nervous grasp of my arm. I turned in my seat. It was Vanderwater who had startled me. He was bent in his seat gazing fiercely through the low windows of the car, and pointing at an open carriage, which came from lower Fifth Avenue, and was crossing the square, going north. In it sat Shannon, and beside him a lady.

I recognized Mrs. Vanderwater!

Her husband, too, had seen her, but instead of springing from the car and pursuing the carriage, which was now passing rapidly through upper Fifth Avenue, he sat like one in a stupor. He did not speak a word, but sat like a statue in his place, and almost as white and cold. When we had reached the street on the car route nearest to his house we got out. He took my arm, but showed no other sign of emotion. We walked a block, and turned the corner nearest his house. We were surprised to find a carriage at the door, and the servants removing baggage from it into the house. He quickened his step, drawing me rapidly with him. As we entered the gate and were ascending the steps a slight scream was heard in the parlors, followed by a cry of "Papa! papa!" and there came bounding out to meet him a young girl still in her traveling-dress. She threw her arms around his neck. It was his daughter—the one who had been traveling in Europe with her mother. She smothered him with kisses, and he carried her, half fainting with joy, and amidst her convulsive sobs, into the parlor, whither I followed. Miss Vanderwater was there, and, seeing my natural embarrassment, she came up to me and told me the particulars of her sister's unexpected arrival. Her statement was interrupted by the father, who started up and asked, wildly,

"And your mother—where is she?"

"She remains in Europe," answered his daughter. "Oh! papa—"

"In Europe? Are you sure?"

"Yes, yes; but let me tell you all about it. Oh, papa! do you know ma thinks she has found Nellie?"

"Found Nellie!" exclaimed the father.

"Oh, it is so strange! When we were in Rome early this year the Consul there told ma of a lady who had lately been privately married to a friend of his, and who strangely resembled her; and the likeness was so remarkable that the Consul afterward frequently referred to it. One day he brought us her photograph; he told us that the lady and her husband had left Rome for Paris, and that he supposed there was no harm in showing us the photograph as confirmation of what he had said about the likeness. When he gave the photograph to mamma she just glanced at it and fainted away."

Mr. Vanderwater stared at his daughter in amazement.

"When she came to, which was in a few moments, she said to me, 'It is your sister, dear—I feel it is my lost baby.' The Consul did not know what it all meant, and I was too much agitated to tell him. When ma was sufficiently calmed she told him the story of how Nellie had been lost in Paris, fifteen years before, and how all search for her had been in vain. He at once became interested in the case, and set persons to work to trace up the gentleman and his wife. He said the gentleman had strong reasons for keeping the marriage a secret—that he wished to conceal Nellie's antecedents. Oh, papa, she has been a model for one of the artists in Rome"—and amidst her sobs the agitated young girl went on to explain that the Consul and Mrs. Vanderwater were in Paris, endeavoring to trace the couple whose names he would not divulge; while she, the daughter, had been hurried home to inform her father of the discovery.

Instantly the truth flashed upon both our minds—the father's and mine.

"Quick, quick!" he said to me. "You can catch them in the coach. Bring them here immediately!"

I needed no second bidding. I sprang into the coach, from which Miss Vanderwater's baggage had by this time been removed, and after a few words of direction to the driver I was soon whirling through the avenue in the direction of Central Park. It was only after passing as rapidly as the rules permitted through the lower part of the Park that I descried Shannon's carriage in the distance, near the Croton Reservoir, beyond the Ramble. I ordered the coachman to drive up to it, and hailing Shannon, I sprang out of my coach and went up to his. The lady drew her veil more closely about her face, and Shannon, rising in his seat, endeavored to interpose his body between her and me.

"Shannon, I know all," I said.

"Know all? What do you mean, my friend?"

"Let me talk to you in quiet—you and your wife," I said.

He sat down again—sank back, as it were, in his seat. I sprang into his coach, and ordered his driver to turn back. Shannon made no resistance; the lady simply grasped his arm and asked what it all meant?

"I hardly know, my dear," he said; "but there is no reason to be alarmed. I confess," he added, turning to me and smiling, "I am somewhat astonished."

I explained in a few words, so that the lady might understand as well as he, and wound up by telling him the suspicion of Mr. Vanderwater and myself that this was the lost Nellie.

On the way to Vanderwater's Nellie told her history as far as she herself knew it. Her early life had been spent in roaming about Europe; her parents—those she had known as such—were itinerant organ-grinders, who roamed about France and Germany and England. When she was ten years old they left her with a wine-grower in Italy, and she had labored in the vineyard. Subsequently, when older, she had fled from the harsh treatment which she had endured in the wine-grower's family, and in her flight she had encountered Shannon. He had taken her with him to Rome, educated her, and eventually had married her.

I shall not attempt to describe the scene when we entered the house. It is impossible to paint such painfully pathetic scenes without in some way detracting from their pathos and beauty. The reader's imagination can supply a better description.

The remarkable likeness was not the only proof of the relationship which was finally adduced. There was found in Mrs. Shannon's possession a locket, marked N. V., and containing a portrait on ivory of Mrs. Vanderwater at twenty, which proved a perfect picture of Nellie at her present age. The relationship was satisfactorily proved; Mrs. Vanderwater was summoned from Paris by telegraph; and those curious for proof of the truth of this strange statement will find her name in the list of the arrivals by the Helvetia on the 27th of June.

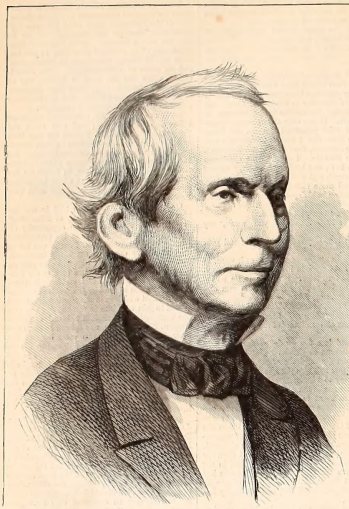
It is unnecessary, of course, to pursue this dénouement further; the reader must intuitively know that painting, painter, and model have become domiciled in the house of their owner and father.

JOSEPH G. COGSWELL, LL.D.,

LATE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE ASTOR LIBRARY.

NEXT to the liberal donor of the Astor Library, the public of this city are indebted for its great advantages to the practical and educated Librarian who first systematized and arranged its one hundred thousand volumes. The donor, as is well known, was the late JOHN JACOB ASTOR. The first Librarian of the institution was Dr. JOSEPH G. COGSWELL, whose portrait we give on page 524, accompanied by a brief statement of his quiet but not uneventful life. It is the story of a great success in a singular field of labor.

Dr. COGSWELL from his earliest infancy evinced a great desire to obtain knowledge; he could read well enough at three years of age to be admitted to the public schools of his native town of Ipswich, Massachusetts; and he graduated at Harvard in 1802 at the early age of 19. Bad health induced him in the same year to embark in a ship bound to the Cape of Good Hope and Calcutta; he made such good use of his opportunity in acquiring all he could in regard to practical navigation that, on his return to America in 1807, he was urged by Mr. WILLIAM GRAY, a ship-owner of Boston, to take command of a large ship then fitting out for a voyage to the north of Europe. He declined the offer in order to study law with FISHER AMES, at Dedham. On the death of Mr. AMES, in 1808, he for a time abandoned the law, and made a business trip to Barbary for Mr. GRAY; on his return he was admitted (1812) to the bar. In the same year he was married to a daughter of J. T. GILMAN, then and for several subsequent terms Governor of New Hampshire.



Mr. COGSWELL left the law, in which he had established himself at Belfast, Maine, in 1813, to accept an appointment as a tutor at Cambridge. He resigned after a year to undertake a commercial venture in the Mediterranean; this completed, he returned to Boston to be met by an advantageous and pleasant offer to accompany a young friend as tutor to Göttingen, and for an European tour subsequently. In this tour he was accompanied by EDWARD EVERETT and GEORGE TICKNOR.

While at Göttingen he first learned to understand the practical importance of a great library, that of the University there being the most systematically classified and arranged, and, for its size, the best in Europe. From Professor BENECKE, one of its principal librarians, he had lectures in the library explaining its arrangement and its mode of administration. The classification, which was the work of HEYNE, was so thoroughly scientific that, when once explained to any one, he could find any book in the library without the aid of librarian or catalogue.

While at Göttingen Mr. COGSWELL was made a Doctor of Philosophy; and then made the "grand tour" of Europe. During the year 1818 he made the tour of Switzerland on foot, traveling in this way over two thousand miles. He had an opportunity subsequently (1819) to examine the library of Dresden, in which he became greatly interested, and in which he learned much of a librarian's peculiar duties from VON FALKENSTEIN, its librarian.

On his return to America in 1821 he was appointed Librarian and Professor of Mineralogy at Harvard. Here he had an opportunity of judging of the general state of the preparatory schools in the country, and from it was led to infer that they could be essentially improved. Mr. GEORGE BANCROFT, who was then also an officer in college, and who had been at the University of Göttingen with him, and had given particular attention to the higher schools of Germany, coincided with him in the above opinion, and agreed to join with him in establishing one of a like standard. "Roundhill School," at Northampton, Massachusetts, was opened by them October, 1823, and within two years it numbered 150 pupils. Its success was followed by the establishment of several similar institutions in different parts of the country, and its influence is seen in the manly and elevated character of many of our most distinguished men who received their early education there. After Mr. BANCROFT retired from it, in 1830, it was continued by Mr. COGSWELL until 1834.

It was in the autumn of 1838 that Mr. JOHN JACOB ASTOR first decided to found a great public library in the city of New York. He had long had in contemplation to bequeath to the city a considerable sum of money as a testimonial of gratitude for the opportunity he had enjoyed in it of acquiring fortune, and of the good feelings he cherished toward it, but had not determined in what way his gift should be appropriated; and for this purpose he consulted with Dr. COGSWELL, who took the liberty to ask Mr. ASTOR what amount he intended to give, and in what way he had thought to have it applied. Mr. ASTOR replied that the sum would be three hundred thousand dollars at least, and that the only object for its appropriation he had thought of was an equestrian statue of WASHINGTON in bronze, of colossal size. In regard to the latter Mr. COGSWELL replied, off-hand, that the value of a statue consisted in its being a tribute of respect from a nation or some great public body, and that from an individual it could only be regarded as a work of art; but as the sum was so much larger than he expected—not then knowing how much Mr. ASTOR liked grand operations—he asked for a little time to deliberate upon it, and to be allowed to give an opinion in writing. Two days after he called again on Mr. ASTOR with the paper containing his opinion and his reasons for it. The substance of this paper was that the sum proposed to be given should not be applied to any object which the Government had power to provide for, or which the common feelings of humanity would be sure to secure, but to one which could only be provided for by private munificence; that among the objects of the latter class there was none of such importance and of such urgent necessity in the city of New York as a great free public library for the use of every one who saw fit to repair to it for information. Mr. ASTOR listened attentively to the paper, and was so satisfied with the reasons given in it that he at once said, in a tone of decision, "A library it shall be." His mind was also made up to carry the project into immediate execution; he directed that a plan of a library edifice should be obtained without delay; and when Mr. COGSWELL went to Europe with his grandson, in 1839, he authorized him to go to Florence and buy the very valuable library which had been formed by Count BOUTOURLIN, and was then offered for sale. Fortunately he was too late; before he reached Europe the library had been sent to Paris, and was then selling by auction. Valuable as it undoubtedly was, it was too exclusively an Italian scholar's library to be of general use in New York. The year after his return to America, by invitation of Mr. ASTOR he became an inmate of his family, and was occupied with him in almost daily conferences about the projected library. Mr. WASHINGTON IRVING and Mr. HENRY BREVOORT often joined in these conferences, and taking every occasion to advise Mr. ASTOR to take measures for carrying his intentions into immediate execution, and this would doubtless have been done but for the indecision arising from age and its infirmities. When Mr. IRVING was appointed Minister to Spain, in 1842, he requested Mr. COGSWELL to go with him as Secretary of Legation, and procured his appointment to that office, which he declined from a fear that if he left Mr. ASTOR it might operate against the library. Nor did he regard this, as was generally supposed, a personal sacrifice made for the public good. He had become strongly attached to Mr. ASTOR, and felt grateful for the uniform kindness with which he had been treated by him, and regarded it as a privilege to listen to the words of wisdom which often fell from his lips; and besides, by daily association with him, he hoped to effect the great purpose which might otherwise fail. Six years passed away in hope deferred, and but for that, on every account most pleasantly. Mr. COGS-

WELL's relations with Mr. ASTOR, and with every member of his family, were most agreeable and harmonious, and the society he met at his table was always intellectual and cultivated.

Soon after Mr. ASTOR's death, which happened March, 1848, the Trustees of the Library named in his will met and organized. Among their first acts was a call for plans of a library building, and the appointment of Mr. COGSWELL to the office of Superintendent. By the conditions of the founder's will the amount bequeathed for the establishment of the Library was to be paid by his executors in annual installments, the first in one year after his death, which necessarily prevented any large immediate expenditures. In the mean while the Superintendent was occupied in making small purchases of books at home, and in preparing a prospective catalogue of works deemed most important in forming the Library, which was printed in a volume of more than four hundred pages at his expense. In December, 1848, an opportunity occurred for making extensive purchases. The large and very valuable library of the Duke of BUCKINGHAM was to be sold by auction in London, which the Trustees authorized the Superintendent to attend. He succeeded in obtaining from it many rare and important works not to be had of the trade, and also made such considerable additions in London and Paris that he returned after a three months' absence with more than twenty thousand volumes. Suitable rooms were provided by order of the Trustees, in which they were opened, placed on shelves, and catalogued. The first installment of the library fund being now paid contracts were made by the Trustees for a library building in conformity with the will of the founder, who had wisely limited its cost to $75,000, and the work upon it was immediately begun.

The prospective catalogue spoken of above was finished and printed during the year 1850, serving as a manual in making new purchases. With this in hand the Superintendent again started for Europe on a book-buying tour. To this he gave fourteen months, from February 1851 to March 1852, during which time he visited all the capitals of Europe, from Naples south to Stockholm north, buying books wherever they could be bought advantageously and establishing correspondences for the library with the leading publishers and dealers in books in every considerable place. At the same time to facilitate the work he caused to be printed in Brussels several sheets of desiderata, which were sent through the post-offices to the principal booksellers in Europe, requesting them to affix prices to the books they had on hand, and return the sheets so marked to the house in Brussels from which they were received. In this way many books long out of print were procured that most probably would not otherwise have been found.

On his return in the spring of 1852 he found the number of volumes now bought amounted to nearly fifty thousand, and that but little more than half of the $120,000 allowed by the will of the founder for the first establishment of the library had been expended. After arranging the books thus far collected, and classifying them as far as could be done in the narrow quarters where they were placed, finding the new library edifice could not be finished for several months, he asked and obtained permission of the Trustees to go to Europe a third time in search of books, voluntarily offering to bear his own expenses. From this last trip he returned in March, 1853, with a freight of twenty thousand additional volumes. The library building was now nearly ready for use, and in June of that year all the books that had been collected were removed to it, and arranged on the shelves so soon as practicable. By the end of the year the work was completed, and early in January, 1854, the Library was opened to the public with a greater number of volumes than any library then existing in the country contained. The whole work had been done within a period of five years. The internal administration of this institution was conducted during the eight succeeding years by Mr. COGSWELL to the satisfaction of the reasonable part of the community, though not always to that of those who wanted the liberty of abusing as well as using the books in it. So long as it was rapidly increasing, a printed catalogue could not be provided for it without incurring a useless expense, but it had a manuscript alphabetical one on slips, which could be indefinitely extended, as only one side was written on a slip. It had also a classified one in manuscript corresponding to the classification of the books on the shelves. Later, when the original appropriation for the library was expended, a complete alphabetical catalogue was prepared by the superintendent, and printed under his revision, in four volumes royal 8vo. He also prepared, and had lithographed or autographed at his own expense, a classified catalogue of 420 pages of the books in the department of Oriental linguistics. In 1859, the North Library building, of the same general extent and construction as the South, was completed, and presented to the Trustees by Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR. It now became necessary to break up the first arrangement of the books, as the shelves in the original building had become crowded. This was done in such a distribution as would provide for the future increase. The appropriation for the department of science and the other for literature naturally originated itself. This arrangement was adopted, and the former class of books assigned to the south building, the latter to the North. In the August of 1859 both the change was made, and every book that was then removed from the hands of the Superintendent, and was by him put in its new space. These various labors soon told upon him, so that he was obliged in the following June to ask the Trustees for a furlough of three months, which they readily granted. Having always experienced the invigorating influences of a voyage across the Atlantic, he took one more trip to Europe, but not without carrying the Library with him in his thoughts. He was allowed to expend $10,000 for the Library, and he brought back with him every dollar of it in books. During this absence in England, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, and France, and returned somewhat invigorated in health. But he was much stronger as he had expended in the last dozen years was not, however, to be so easily repaired. After six months he was allowed to him that he must retire from a post of such exhausting services; accordingly he sent in his resignation to the Trustees of the Library in 1861, which was not accepted until the following autumn, when MR. SCHROEDER was appointed to succeed him, since which, though retained on the charge of the institution, his interest in it has not waned. Not long ago, at the request of the Trustees, he prepared a supplementary volume of the catalogue, containing titles of all the books that had been added to the Library since the publication of the previous volumes, with an Index to the subjects of all the books in the Library, alphabetical and classified combined.

A SHAKSPEARIAN LIBRARY.

In the preceding article we have given a very interesting and reliable account of the origin and history of the Astor Library, of New York city. In the same place we illustrate the interior of the Shakspearian Memorial Library, in Birmingham, England. This library is one of the few permanent and sensible monuments which were produced by the Tercentenary commemoration of the world-wide Shakspearian Library, and the purpose is to place in it every real edition of SHAKSPEARE'S works and every book that has been written about them. The pictures and books are the pertinence of locating this at Birmingham is that that city is the principal one in SHAKSPEARE'S native county, and that its people are filled with scholarly people. MR. SAMUEL TIMMINS, the Honorary Secretary of the Library, did great service in editing and publishing, a few years ago, the first two editions of Hamlet side by side, in opposite pages. They were known as the "Birmingham Hamlets." MR. TIMMINS asks contributions to the library from all students of and writers upon SHAKSPEARE. In a letter to MR. HENRY WHITE, the Shakspearian scholar and critic of this city, MR. TIMMINS says: "We do not ask an; favor, but we simply say to the world that we have built SHAKSPEARE'S house, we have begun a literary monument to SHA.-SPEARE'S fame, and we invite you to contribute whatever one or ornament you may have formed." In the case of MR. WHITE, he writes that this is needless for the society has bought his edition of SHAKSPEARE, and his critical books. The library is the property of the town, and can not be sold or removed. There is a handsome and increasing yearly subscription to it, and already re books have been sent from Germany, France, e, as well as England. It will be the most remarkable literary monument ever set up to any ther; and every American author and publisher should see that their editions are embraced its catalogue.

RAIL HUNTING IN VIRGINIA.

THE "Sora" of Virginia, the "Coot" of the prairies, the "Fresh water mud-hen" of ore ignorant whites, and the "Pennsylvania" e more superstitious negroes of the south, is the Virginia Rail—Rallus Virginicus—of the nithologist. It is one of the most singular of merican birds, and the manner in which it is ught is one of the most singular features of merican hunting. Our illustrations on page show the peculiarities of the bird, and indite the manner in which he is caught.

Although WILSON has described the Sora—under the name of Rail—very little is known to the multitude in regard to its habits. In Virginia and the Carolinas the Sora is considered a great delicacy. It is a bird about ten inches in length, and in the season when they are hunted are very plump and fat. The top of the head and the upper surface of the body are black streaked with brown; the whole lower surface ash-orange-brown. It frequents marshy lands and rivers, and is to be found always about wet places. Its usual food consists of small snail shells, worms and the larvæ of insects which it extracts from the mud. It has a great aversion to taking to the wing, and when pursued flies close to the water, and then seldom more than twenty or thirty yards. Nevertheless at the appearance of the first hard frost they cease their nocturnal voyages; and for the remainder of the winter is nowhere to be found in Virginia and the Carolinas. It appears to fly over the country in the same manner; and it has been said that the bird has been seen many miles at sea. Owing to the sudden and mysterious disappearance of the bird there has long prevailed among the negroes of Virginia a belief that it turns into a frog, and hence the name given to it.

The manner of capturing them as it prevails in Virginia is shown in our engraving. The hunters go upon the marshes at night, having a pan of burning pine-knots in the prow of their boat. The birds, which are very reluctant to leave their wet and boggy haunts by day, are near the approach of the light, and are struck down by paddles, boughs of pine, or switches with the end branches shaved off, and thus secured. Immense numbers are nightly captured in the Virginia swamps in this manner.

UNPUBLISHED POEM BY MILTON.

MR. HENRY MORLEY has discovered an unpublished poem by MILTON in the British Library. He found it written in a handwriting like MILTON'S on a blank leaf in a copy of the original edition of MILTON'S poems in the British Museum. The poem was written in 1647, when MILTON was 28 years old, and is signed "J. M., Ober, 1647." It is an epitaph on a child, and for himself, and certainly, if internal evidence may be trusted, it is Milton's. A good critic might have imitated his style, but no one but himself could have infused into those long words, and farfetched thoughts, and forced images such a subtle melody as pervades these like these:

"AN EPITAPH.

"He whom Heaven did call away
Out of this Hermitage of clay
Has left some reliques in this Urn
As a pledge of his return.

"Meanwhile the Muses do deplore
The loss of this their paragon,
With whom the Graces all the day
Builded forth its tender ivy.
And now Apollo with the lays,
And puts on cypress for his bays:
The sacred sisters three times eight
Only to the blubbering rites,
And while he down they plink upon
Make their own tears their Helicon;
Leaving the twy-topt Mount to strive
To turn votaries to his shrine.
Think not, mother, me less bleat,
Steeping in this narrow chest,
Than if my sons did lay in bed
Under some stately pyramid.
If a rich tomb delight to have,
Than Bee was happier far than men
Who, busy in their vocal cell,
Was fettered by the golden dood
Which from the Attic Amber-cone trip
Distilleth down so pleaseously:
For so this little urnful can
Most gloriously enshrined itself.
A tomb where nasty worms but compass
With Cleopatra's sepulchre.

"In this little bed my dust
Incumbent lies with no intrust;
While my more pure and nobler part
Lies enshrined in my heart.

"Then pass on gently ye that mourn,
Touch not this stone hallowed Urn;
These Ashes—and that is more remain
A vital thucture still retain:
A sensual form within the deep
Of this little chaos sleeps;
The living eye of life could be
Into its first existence;
Infant sinews cradled here
In its principles appear;
This plant, shall unreserved into dust,
In its Ashes rest it must
Until sweet Psyche shall inspire
A softening and astific fire,
And in her fecund bosom enfold
This heavy and this earthly mould,
Then is I am I'll be so more,
But bloom and blossom [as] hitherto.
When this small cinnamon shall retreat
By a more than chymick heat.

"J. M., Ober, 1647."

ZOUAVE DRILL IN TOMPKINS SQUARE.

THE competitive drill between the Montgomery Light Guard, of Boston, and Company E of the Twenty-fifth Regiment, New York State, at Tompkins Square on July 30, and was witnessed by an immense crowd of citizens. It was hardly to be supposed that so apparently insignificant an affair as a drill by single companies would attract so great a concourse of spectators, and the police arrangements by no means adequate. The entire State Guard became interested in the affair, and thousands of them were in attendance, besides a vast number of more demonstrative, if less interested, persons. Our illustration will give an idea of the crowd and the scene.

The uniform of the Twelfth Regiment, as is well known, consists of a dark blue coat and cap, both bordered with light-blue cord, light blue Zouave pantaloons, and light leather gaiters. The uniform of Montgomery Light Guard consists of a dark-blue coat, red Zouave pantaloons, light leather gaiters, and a white cap, which, in cold weather, is exchanged for dark-blue. Half of the men were veteran soldiers, and served during the war in the Ninth and Twenty-eighth Massachusetts regiments. All looked rugged and accustomed to service. The company had won a champion flag for two successive years as the best-drilled in its regiment, and propose to compete for it again next September, when it will have the honor of permanently keeping it. It also won, last Spring, the champion flag for being the best-drilled company in the entire State of Massachusetts, but must hold itself subject to lose it whenever a rival shows more excellence. The freedom with both marching and the manual peculiar to old soldiers seemed to characterize this company in contradistinction to its rival, but the precision of the latter, nor was the leading superior. The two companies were much alike in their proficiency, and both won equal plaudits. A decision was rendered in favor of Company E, not especially for greater excellence, but because their drill allowed more closely to the minutiæ of "Upton's Tactics," which was the standard by which the judges were to be guided. The Guard was perfectly satisfied with the award, the flag was presented to Company E, and both companies marched to Astor Place, where they broke ranks and dispersed.

SEWING MACHINES AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.—"There seems to be considerable contradiction among the successful exhibitors as to the awards made to their respective merit. The recipients of the two gold medals severally advertise that theirs is the only gold medal, this circumstance leaving the public in doubt as to which. Others concur that no gold medal was awarded to any sewing machine whatever. Happily, it is not our duty to decide this knotty question; but, be it as it may, the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINES have received the very highest prize —above all rivals—their representative in Paris having been decorated by the Emperor with the Cross of the Legion of Honor."

We find the above in one of our English exchanges, and transfer it to our columns with satisfaction. It is gratifying to find that the GROVER & BAKER MACHINE, which stands so high at home, should also receive the highest honor abroad.—N. Y. Express.

A CURE FOR ASTHMA.—Letters from Ex-President VAN BUREN, also from his physician, expressed much gratification with the result of taking WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY.

I GOT BIT.

Mine eyes were swollen and almost shut, my whole face and arms were covered with swellings from my thumb, caused by mosquitoes that infest this vicinity. I got WOLCOTT'S PAIN EXPELLER, made an application, all pain went, as if by magic, instantly disappeared, the swellings subsided very soon, and I cheerfully endorse it as the best thing in the world.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal which has not entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even jobbers have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these watches are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them to excel all time-keepers. Price $10 to $25. Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent free to any address.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches, can be sent by express, C.O.D., with choice.

THE BILIOUS SEASON.

Seventy-five per cent. of the population of the United States are more or less bilious at this season. The midsummer sun stirs up the bile as certainly as it evolves miasma from the stagnant pools. It is of no unique importance, therefore, to check the tendency of the liver to disorder action with that incomparable anti-bilious specific—

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Neglect the early symptoms, and the chances are that they will result in remittent fever, fever and ague, or jaundice. It is presumed that nobody deliberately desires to risk an attack from any one of these. But carelessness may be as disastrous as temerity. Do not procrastinate. As health is the greatest of earthly blessings, it should be every rational being's first care. Whoever chooses to use HOSTETTER'S BITTERS as a preventive sure may escape the bilious epidemics and endemics which so generally prevail toward the close of the heated terms and in the fall months. Is it not worth while to be forearmed when the means of defence are within the reach of all? THE BITTERS are a NATIONAL REMEDY, every where procurable, and endorsed by the intelligent of every class. Read what leading members of the community, clergymen, physicians, authors, statesmen, men of science, artists, travellers, and distinguished soldiers, say about them. On the strength of these credentials, give them a trial. They will be found the very best and most genuine medicine that modern pharmacy has introduced.

OF
IN
THE UNITED STATES.
By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.
With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.
COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

This is one of the great enterprises of the day. The historical matter is really valuable; the sketches of incidents and incidents are admirably drawn, not only by the pen of the historian, but by the pencil of the artist, and both combined will make, when bound, one of the marked histories of this war, if not the great history of the war. There are official documents on every page, at the bottom, which add much to the value of the work. It will be found on the centre-tables of thousands of our countrymen.—Boston Post.

Many of its illustrative pictures are the best that we have seen in such a work; and some of the numerous portraits of prominent agents in the war are admirable as likenesses and works of art.—London Athenæum.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and in the size and beauty of its pages and paper, in the profuseness, costliness, elegance, and completeness of its illustrations, far exceeding any other history yet attempted.—New York Observer.

We speak confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. This narrative, embellished by the picturesque illustrations, affords an interesting commentary on the war, and will be of priceless value for preservation.—Boston Advertiser.

The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation.—New York Tribune.

Never has the war's story been better told than it is in these vigorous, truthful, and critically written pages.—Boston Traveller.

ROGERS'S STATUE OF AMERICA.

In the Via della Frezza, Rome, a street that, near the Piazza del Popolo end of the Corso, runs between the latter street and the Via di Ripetta, is a workshop known, since the commencement of this century, as the "Studio di Canova." From time to time, after that artist's death, it was occupied by men styling themselves "the favorite pupils of CANOVA." Naturally, when the fashion of admiring the works of this master went out almost entirely, the desire to claim the prestige of association with him and with the place where some of his best known works were executed, died out also. Says the matter-of-fact proverb, "One nail drives out another," and henceforward, in future years, this studio will boast a truer charm for visitors from this side of the world, since here are being modeled, by our countryman, RANDOLPH ROGERS, the colossal figures for two of the most important among the war-monuments that have as yet been commissioned by this country. The crowning figure for the Michigan memorial to the soldiers who fell for the Union has already been cast in plaster, and left Rome for Munich, there to be worked in bronze. Our illustration is a sketch of a second colossal figure now growing into beauty under the master-hand of the sculptor. It is some twelve feet in height, and is to surmount the monument commissioned for the State of Rhode Island. While it may assuredly be pronounced equal in power and significance to the first-named, the spirit in which it is conceived, and the expression of face and form, are in actual contrast with the other statue. In the first we have the ardent, victorious genius of the State rushing on to the goal already won. With uplifted shield and ready sword, she appears still in the act of defending the causes and looking abroad for fresh foes to conquer. In the second, the subject of our sketch, America stands in her proud tranquillity, with her exultation subdened by the loss of her best and bravest, and she scatters o'er their names her wreaths of laurel and immortelles before sheathing her sword to dwell hereafter among the memories of the past. Her attitude of repose and sweetly solemn countenance tell all this, and shadow forth the Spartan mother in her pride and her anguish, when, the victory being won, she counts her loss and her country's gain. MR. ROGERS has given her no warlike emblem save the sword and a tunic of scale-armor. A cap of liberty with a starry diadem encircles her noble brow and confines her waving hair. An ample mantle flows back from her shoulders to the ground, whose folds, though very broad and massive, still betray the figure beneath them.

ROGERS, THE SCULPTOR, MODELING HIS COLOSSAL STATUE OF AMERICA, AT ROME, JUNE, 1868.—[SKETCHED BY J. O'B. IRWIN.]

LONG BRANCH AND NAUVOO.

PASSING out of New York Bay, between Long and Staten islands (the latter belonging to New York, but more nearly attached to New Jersey), and just skimming the outer edge of Raritan Bay, we sail in between Sandy Hook and the New Jersey shore, and, landing near old Shrewsbury Inlet, take the railroad train for Long Branch. It has been a beautiful sail to this landing, taking us past the Nevisink Highlands, which by night, from the light-houses on the heights, give the sailors the first warning of their proximity to our coast, and which are the most interesting and charming feature of this picturesque coast.

We have left Rockaway Beach far off on the northeast, and are pushing on toward Long Branch—the most fashionable resort on our coast—which, during late years, has eclipsed even Newport. At Long Branch, during the summer, one sees a perfect microcosm of American life. There are our generals, our statesmen, our poets, our judges, our merchants, our publishers, our editors—and, above all, and most worthy of our notice, are our American ladies of fashion—the crème de la crème of city society, from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Washington. SHERMAN now has hands full and his house full. The surf is dotted with bathers, and the beach is dotted with children at play, during the fashionable hours for bathing. Then there are the fashionable loungers with their eye-glasses, enjoying the scene and growing young again under the regenerating influences of the sea-breeze. By day there is the beach and the drive, croquet on the lawn for the children, while sewing occupies the ladies in the parlors or on the piazzas of the hotel.

Eleven o'clock A.M. is the fashionable hour for bathing. After the bath follows a short nap, and then dinner; next a walk along the bluffs. The gentlemen of leisure take a stage, or hitch, and ride down to Pleasure Bay, a mile and a quarter distant, where they fish and sail on the Shrewsbury River, returning to Long Branch in time for supper.

A few come to stay, and have a season of pleasure; but the many come and go. While the gong is calling the former to supper the latter are preparing to take the train for New York. Thus at six o'clock P.M. the broad avenue in front of the hotels is crowded with carriages rushing toward the depôt. Meanwhile those who remain, after finishing their evening meal, promenade upon the hotel piazzas, play at billiards or ten-pins, walk on the beach, smoke on the hotel balcony, or go into the parlor and "wheel through the giddy mazes of the dance."

Such is life at Long Branch, only we have not touched upon the fun, frivolity, and gossip in which these fashionable pleasure-seekers indulge.

On the way from New York to Long Branch, and about five miles from the latter, is Nauvoo, where dwell the "Dolliers of the Sea." Here every day is offered a picture which is a striking contrast to that of fashionable life at Long Branch. There are the pleasure-seekers—here are the workers. The former look upon the sea from the beach; they bathe in the surf—but they only touch the hem of Neptune's garment. But these men and boys at Nauvoo live for the most part upon the sea. There is their life and their labor. On the whole, it is a much more attractive picture than Long Branch affords. A newspaper correspondent thus describes it: "If a town was near at hand, the visitor would be reminded of the opening scene of 'Enoch Arden.' The houses lean from the ocean; boats drawn up on the shore; some landing with freight in the surf; nets drying in the sun; bronzed men, with glazed hats, moving among sloops high and dry; sand drifted like snow against the dwellings; a boy painting a skiff; a woman with a babe in her arms, looking out of the door on the broad blue ocean, watches Dermott's boat as it approaches the shore; white-caps rolling far out at sea, and ships with white sails making for the bottom's bar." There are at this little village of Nauvoo about fifty-five men and boys—all fishermen. For the most part their homes are upon the main land; but here is the scene of their labors. And they make money rapidly. A boat, with its fishing apparatus, costs about seventy-five dollars—a double boat, with nets, about twice that sum. These fishermen earn upon an average about eight dollars a day per day. Some of them have made a fortune. "There is a man," says a fisherman to us, "who is worth a hundred thousand dollars." And this is only an isolated instance. It is from this class of fishermen, which we find not only here but at Gloucester, on the Cod, that our navy is furnished with sailors. Here is their school. Here they learn to brave the storm and to be ever ready to run to the sea and the winds. And when we are at war, here it is that we find the stalwart men and boys to man our ships. What a contrast is there between this Nauvoo—this village of fishermen—and Long Branch! Still, of the two, for natural scenery, Nauvoo has the advantage. Behind it are the beautiful Nevisink Highlands, and before it is the open sea, from which these toilers yearly gather a rich harvest. The ancient which it impressed upon our memory will not soon be effaced.

"WHAT! OLD MOLE!"

WHEN LEE surrendered to GRANT and JOHNSTON to SHERMAN, and the crowd in Wall Street sang Old Hundred upon the steps of the Exchange, there was doubtless a very general feeling not only that the Union arms were victorious, but that the rebellion was suppressed. No man, however, who permitted himself to think, or remember human experience as recorded in history, shared that sweet illusion. No cause which has become a tradition, a passion, a religion in the minds of many people is ever suppressed because of a defeat in the field, however signal. When it involves fundamental principles of society, of industry, of government, it is, in its essence, one of the extremest tenacity. It awaits its opportunity. It is served by stealth, indeed, but with an unwearied faith, and with a resolution the more indomitable that it is hidden, and which will try and try again, and in every way, the chances of success. The Moonstone, as we have just seen in WILKIE COLLINS'S fascinating story, may be torn from the head of the idol in India, and concealed for years in England, but the priests of the idol follow and follow, and plot and scheme and dare, and while they live never relinquish the hope and the effort of recovery, and when they die bequeath to their successors the duty of constant pursuit.

The rebellion was the open attempt of the aristocratic principle to subvert a free and progressively liberal Government. That principle had adjusted society in the Southern States upon the medieval basis; and as a possible necessary defense of that system it inculcated a theory of government in general, and of this Government in particular, which would paralyze any force that could interfere with its supremacy. That is to say, it had established slavery in small separate States in which the State alone was competent to act upon the subject; and that the same States might individually decide whether they would remain united with the rest. The aristocratic spirit in every way fostered this social and political theory. In its own section it intrenched slavery in the religious sentiment, and declared social slavery to be the purest foundation of political freedom. It exalted the grandeur and supreme sovereignty of the State, and carefully cherished suspicion, jealousy, and hostility of the Union. Within its domain it asserted the State against the national authority, and dared the local contests which the National Government declined. In 1832 JACKSON threatened; but JACKSON compromised and CALHOUN conquered.

Beyond its section, and in the country at large, this strenuous spirit insisted that the social system was guaranteed in the Constitution; that its political theories were not expressly denied in it; that its section produced the great crop of the country and was, therefore, the arbiter of national prosperity; that no reform in its system could be made but by means the results of which it feared, imperil every interest in every hope; and that its views must be therefore tolerated, if not approved. Meanwhile, by an alliance with the dominant party of the other section of the country, it secured national supremacy and bent every energy to advancing its own purposes and to demoralizing the public opinion of the North, which was its chief enemy. The two ends were simultaneously pursued. Its main purpose was to change the nature of the Government to an aristocratic system. Its plan was to nationalize slavery, and to win the assent of the North by pecuniary interest; by political ambition; by open threats; by alleged doubts of Constitutional intention; and by the grossest moral debauchery. How far it had succeeded, the appalling situation of the country in 1860 shows. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS retired from Congress, because the aristocratic spirit had made sure of the Supreme Court, and the victory was virtually won. In Massachusetts DANIEL WEBSTER bored his head to the cap of GESLER, and begged his fellow-citizens to conquer their prejudices. In New York CHARLES O'CONOR insisted, before the highest court, that slavery should be re-established in the State. And when, in the interest of the aristocratic system, the Democratic party of the United States falsified history, the Northern tools of the Southern power insolently mocked at the friends of liberty and sneered: "What are you going to do about it?"

The answer they gave was an appeal to the conscience and common-sense of the country, which resulted in the election of MR. LINCOLN. It was then clear to the aristocratic leaders that they must instantly use their strength to accomplish their revolution. When they seceded they believed that the country would avoid war upon their terms. This was the advice of the Democratic papers; this was the expectation of Northern Democratic leaders. And in DOUGLAS'S last speech—called one of the secession Senators in a letter since published, merely to beware of force. But the hot-heads, as usual, baffled the plans of the cooler chiefs and began the war. It raged for four years, during which the Northern political allies of the aristocrats did what they passively could to secure an aristocratic victory. But the people knew that the cause of aristocracy was lost, for the time, in the field. But defeat never converts. It is to the defeated what persecution is to the martyr. The cause becomes more precious, and fidelity to it a more sacred duty. The history of the Southern States since the surrender shows this plainly. At first abasement and cringing, meekness, submission, and apparent loyalty. Then, upon the slightest hope of aid or sympathy from the Executive, the old spirit stealthily reveals its old character. It is ready to ask why? Why emancipation? The Black codes; the reluctant legislation upon secession and emancipation; the denunciation and hatred of Union soldiers and loyal citizens; the massacres of Memphis and New Orleans; the refusals of the amendment; the terrorism at elections, were signs of the old vigor. And as the contest between the President and Congress, so did the tone of the aristocratic leaders become more defiant and familiar, until throwing aside every disguise they stalked openly into the Convention of their old party, at once resume their leadership, declare that the debt of the war shall not be paid, but that the Government shall be discharged from it, and declare that the settlement offered them by the country is unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, and nominating a man who had denounced the war, and another who had been a rebel soldier. If we would resist the settlement by the sword, they hasten home to profess their unswerving fidelity to the old cause, and their sure faith of retrieving at the polls its failure in the field.

And thereupon HORATIO SEYMOUR feebly whispers from Utica, that the success of these aristocratic chiefs will "probably only lead to that peaceful restoration of the Union and re-establishment of fraternal relationship which the country desires."

This is only the old exhortation to conquer our prejudices; to re-establish slavery in New York; in a word, to submit to the spirit which is determined to change the nature of our government, and which is not in the least dismayed, but is merely embittered by the result of the war. Civilization, free popular government, the highest human development, require that its defeat at the polls shall be as signal as it was in the field. The purpose of its subverters in this election is the same that it was at Bull Run and Andersonville, although the means are different. That the purpose may be honest and they sincere only makes their defeat more important. Remember, then, that if the friends of equal rights are not as untiring and as wary as their enemies, peace will be indefinitely postponed.

BATTERIES UNMASKED.

THOSE who wish the earliest practicable restoration of national tranquillity ought to know exactly the spirit with which the leaders of the Democratic Convention has awakened, and the expectations with which SEYMOUR and BLAIR are supported. A few extracts will show.

MR. VANCE, in Richmond, asserts that

"What the Confederacy fought for would be won by the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR."

MR. WADE HAMPTON declared that when the war ended he sheathed his sword because his State commanded it. He had supposed that things would be settled as he wished.

"Unfortunately, things had taken a different turn than that hoped for by the supporters of truth, justice, and the Constitution, and now the spectacle was presented in the halls of legislation, by those who undertake to govern the destinies of the free races, was unutterable indeed. As serious as he was as to secure peace and prosperity, he never could consent to attempt it on so false, gross, and outrageous a platform as that of the Reconstruction acts—particularly when he saw the seats of HAYES, MCDONELL, and CALDWELL in the Senate of the United States, filled by such men as they were from Massachusetts. (Hisses and groans for TOM ROBERTSON.).... He wanted restoration on the basis of truth, harmony, and justice; and he firmly believed we should be in it November 3, the triumph of the Democratic party. He had been told not to lose sight of Pennsylvania. He (MR. HAMPTON) claim that Ohio was certain for SEYMOUR; and shrewd political thinkers of New York and Pennsylvania were equally confident of the same result in those States. The people were thoroughly aroused, and in November the result of it would be more rapid travelling of carpet-baggers from the South than was ever before known in the history of this country."

MR. WEEMS, in the Georgia Convention, took the ground that the rebellion was a war under the Constitution of the United States, and that the hope of constitutional liberty requires the return to power of JEFFERSON DAVIS, BRECKINRIDGE, TOOMBS, SLIDELL, and the other rebel leaders. Of the war he said:

"The Southern people were all in favor of that war. There was some difference among them in reference to the exercise of separate State action, and with regard to the time when the contest ought to commence. But when the first cannon boomed from Fort Moultrie the hearts of our whole people were united, and all sectional disagreement was forgotten that war for the Constitution. But the South was, for a time, overwhelmed. And the Radicals pretend that they have made peace. I tell you it is not so. They may cry, 'Peace, peace!' but there is no peace. Free government is destroyed, commerce is crippled, agriculture is prostrate, civilization itself is fast back; and there will be neither peace nor prosperity again until the cause of constitutional liberty, for which we contended during the war, shall be at last triumphant. For this it is necessary that in the coming election the Democratic party shall succeed. The party which at present rules the country has established a spectacle of fraud, hypocrisy, and mendacity unparalleled in the annals of this world. The CAESARISM, a MARIUS, a ROBESPIERRE, would have shrunk from perpetrating the outrages they have perpetrated. And they do, in fact, in the name of what they call 'the best Government the world ever knew!'"

Of the FOURTEENTH Amendment he said:

"Every one who is for that amendment is a marked man henceforth, and will receive the infamy he deserves. But we did the best we could when we put up that amendment? Principally for the purpose of keeping out of office such noble gentlemen and true patriots as JOHN A. CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER STEPHENS, ROBERT TOOMBS, B. H. HILL, JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, and JEFFERSON DAVIS. Why, every one knew that if men like these should ever get back to Washington the miscreants who are now holding power would shrink away abashed at their pure presence."

One who was present says that "as MR. WEEMS named each of the 'patriots' in the list above there was a storm of cheers; but when he mentioned the name of JEFFERSON DAVIS the hall at once became the scene of a wild and tumultuous uproar. Both delegates and spectators jumped to their feet, as if in excitement uncontrollable. Hats and handkerchiefs were waved and shaken fiercely above their heads, and yells, and shouts, and cheers, and wild gesticulations in the space of two minutes, shook the hall. Well might an old Unionist who sat beside me whisper, 'It is 1860 over again!'"

MR. J. M. RAMSEY said in the same Convention:

"The people of Georgia have always been loyal to the Constitution. At the very first breach that instrument was endangered they withdrew from the Union, as they had a right to do. But the Government at Washington commenced to wage war upon them. From that hour the Constitution was overthrown. We have endured all we could since then, under the leadership of SEYMOUR and BLAIR, to raise the Constitution from the dust; we have exhausted every effort decked. Some of her children, during the war that was forced upon them, deserted her and joined her enemies. Let them be, like ARNOLD, forever accursed. We have seen our soldiers fall, our cities in flames, our fields deluged with fraternal blood. We looked upon it unmoved and unblenched. But we can bear it no longer. We will rise in our strength, to cover our lost liberties, and restore the State. We are in the habit of settling our elections, which may be peacefully at the ballot-box; but if not, then the true men of the South will rally once more around their war-tested leader, and fight for the issue at the cartridge-box. [Loud and enthusiastic applause.] Rebellion against the Constitution is treason, and you are men in the North who are now truly with you, and who will, in case of necessity, lead regiments and battalions. We did not make the other war. It was forced upon us. We simply stood for the rights for which our fathers fought. And we will stand them again, come peace or war! [Loud applause.]"

HOWELL COBB, in a recent speech in Georgia, speaks of our friends BROWN, who is one of those who have honorably accepted the result of the war, which MR. COBB, one of its original instigators, has not, as follows:

"As far as Georgia is concerned, the right in assigning him the status which he has taken for himself? If bigness or wealth entitles Georgia, it is the State of Georgia that he is, and I shall not dispute the doctrine. [Laughter and applause.] Let him associate with those who have been in this country, and were born here! (A voice says 'AMEN.') Amen and Amen! Let him associate with those whose children have grown valleys, from your old men and your young men, your women and your children, until one proud shout and shall ring through every throbbing heart: 'Overboard with him!' He has turned traitor to the country! I tell you very frankly, my friends, I am not an interloper out man; but when I see a white man talking to Joe Brown and that white man a carpet-bagger, it revolves conce over me. I can't help it. But when I see them talking to a negro in reference for the negro. They are six more votes for Joe Brown. I will give him about three more, and quit him. I say to you, my friends, as you owe it to yourselves, you owe it to the country who sleep in their graves, to observe these things. Let us have peace, but let us have it in truth and honor, and let upon those who dishonor the memory of the dead. You owe it to the living, you owe it to your own children, and to their children. Write down in their memories this day, and all days, and for all time to come, the living and spiritless spectacle with which you regard and estimate these men. O Heavens! for some brave Roman now, that I may write in fiamy upon the forehead of these men [Applause]; that they may travel through earth, despised of all men, and rejected of Heaven—scorned by the devil himself. They may seek their final congenial resting-place under the shades of that ancient institution. [Laughter and applause.]

Such frank disclosures of the real significance of the nomination of SEYMOUR and BLAIR alarm the Northern managers. They know that they have no hope but in deceiving the country; and they have consequently begged their allies at the South to be more prudent. The Charleston Mercury says:

"Private advices from our most strenuous friends at the North, request that we should protest against the ingenious expressions that have escaped some Southern speakers, since the adjournment of the National Democratic Convention. It is represented to us that great injury is accruing to the cause from such imprudence. We therefore shall make no apologies to the parties the satisfaction of our publication to the fact. We are all desirous of pushing on the good work of success, and as one world voluntarily impede its course who was aware of the fact. While no man in the South should be, and no true man is, ashamed of his past record, and while there was much to be said of the past, we should speak like true men, it is questionable whether at this time any thing is to be gained by too much reference to things that are on people's nerves. What we want just now is to win."

But after the exulting chorus that has been already raised over the platform of repudiation and revolution and the nomination of SEYMOUR and BLAIR, the silence of HAMPTON and TOOMBS will be more deceptive than the speech of SEYMOUR. The Democratic purpose is fully revealed by the Democratic leaders; and it is not difficult to imagine what would be the "peace" which the success of such leaders would secure for all steadfast Union men in the Southern States. With the rebellion claimed as a defense of the Constitution—with the debt incurred in suppressing it dishonored—with the new State governments dispersed by the army —with the whole colored population regulated by black codes—with the most acrimonious rebels exercising power in the spirit here revealed, a spirit which is very natural to men who regard their success as the triumph of principle—should we not have a situation that would cheer the "Conservative" soul?

MAILED WARRIORS.

GENERAL BLAIR speaks of General GRANT as a "mailed warrior," implying that he will probably prove to be MR. CALEB CUSHING'S "man on horseback," who, in the prophetic visions of that sage, was to come riding rapidly over the horizon and trample all our liberties, as General BLAIR wishes the President to trample the Reconstruction acts, into dust. The truth is, however, that among all famous and successful soldiers there is no one who has shown less of the traditional character of the "mailed warrior" than General GRANT. When General MCCLELLAN was in command of the armies the people who now zealously portray the perils of the rule of a "mailed warrior" talked freely of the marching of the whole legion, and threatening the Government at his will. Indeed, it is just the spirit of such people that makes the despotism of a mailed warrior possible. But when General GRANT came to the chief command all the traditional danger to liberty that is supposed to lurk in great military success disappeared. When the "friends" of the MCCLELLAN had no longer a tool in the chief command of the army, the public liberties and entire subordination of the military power to the civil administration were secure. Nobody suspected that General GRANT had better march upon Washington and disperse Congress.

Indeed, among the most extraordinary and valuable results of the war is the proof it has afforded that a self-governing people may be forced to resort to war upon the largest scale without developing the slightest tendency toward a military despotism, either in the aspiration of successful Generals or in the subdued spirit of the nation. CHARLES JAMES FOX was severely censured, as often by Democrats in England, for saying at the opening of the French Revolution that a man did not cease to be a citizen by becoming a soldier. The event in France, indeed, disproved his expectations. The military régime produced the mailed warrior upon horseback whose name was NAPOLEON BONAPARTE. But on this side are his words were verified in the peaceful organization of constitutional government, and in the modest patriotism of the victorious commander-in-chief. And still more conspicuously has our late history shown that, in a popular system as for advanced as ours, the "mailed warrior," if Generals there must be, is the man who knows the successful republican soldier spurns the part.

General GRANT in the field was as distinguished for constant subordination to authority as for universal victory. Not less remarkable was his instinctive generosity toward all his Generals. He would not appropriate the least laurel of another. When he proposed his plan of campaign against Vicksburg, his friend General SHERMAN, a soldier of undoubted military genius and consummate judgment, wrote an elaborate criticism of it censuring it as improper and impracticable. When the campaign was triumphant, and the fall of Vicksburg had opened the Mississippi, General SHERMAN frankly and generously owned that he had been mistaken. And when, after his great victory in the field, General SHERMAN made what was considered his very grave error in negotiation in North Carolina—an error so grave that it was generally felt to have imperiled all the advantage he had secured—General GRANT went in person and removed the difficulty so quietly and considerately, that not only did he avoid all prominence but the sensitive soldier, whose action he overruled, remained more firmly his friend than ever. This was hardly the act of General BLAIR'S "unbridled warrior;" it was the conduct of a modest, simple, and most sagacious citizen.

As General-in-Chief intrusted with the temporary charge of the War Department, and with enormous discretionary powers under the military bill, General GRANT's action has still failed to reveal the mailed warrior. It has been uniformly that of a wise, able, skilful administrator, and of the most "law-abiding" citizen. Calumny itself, or even ROBERT TOOMBS, who denounces GRANT's election as a disaster, can not point to a solitary instance of General GRANT's arbitrary act in his administration of the peculiar responsibility laid upon him. General GRANT, indeed, known Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS and his kind well. He knows the quality of Southern rebel devotion to the Union and of Democratic regard for equal rights. But neither indignation nor contempt has for a moment disturbed the just moderation with which he has exercised his vast authority. The fear of danger which General BLAIR intends to excite by describing General GRANT as a mailed warrior is as reasonable as the old Aurora attacks upon General WASHINGTON. For GRANT is of the WASHINGTON school of middle-class citizens—to intrust them to his tranquil and judicious care, assisted by those calm nurses of freedom and patriotism, Robert Toombs, Horace Cobb, Horatio Seymour, and Henry A. Wise.

THE GOLD SPECULATION.

The payment for Alaska has furnished an opportunity for carrying up the price of gold to an extent which is detrimental to the business of the country. When the appropriation for this purpose was about to be made by Congress it was stated that the payment of the seven millions which constituted the purchase-money would leave but thirty-seven millions in gold, or thereabouts, in the Treasury, and that our exports of gold since the 1st of January amounted to seventy millions of dollars. Both these statements are found to be erroneous; for it appears that after that payment has been made about forty-five millions in gold were in the Treasury on the 2d instant, and that the amount thus exported, up to Saturday last, is about sixty millions. The forty-three millions which remain will be sufficient for the July interest, and for the bonds of '48 which have matured, amounting together to about eight millions of dollars.

It is probable that the payment of the whole sum of seven millions might have been made without sending gold abroad; but the agents in this country, who acted for the London agents of the Russian Government, have preferred to send two millions in gold, half of which went forward on Saturday, with the effect, whatever may have been the intent, to aid the speculation by which gold has been carried up; while at the same time the transfer of that amount to the London market might have been made through the instrumentality of bills of exchange to the advantage to the fund, and with equal advantage to the business interests of the United States. The power of such bills in the market here is a clear indication that this policy might have been pursued; and it will be a subject of regret not only that the payment for this purchase should have fallen upon us at this time, but that in the transfer of the amount to London there should have been a manifest departure from the course which the interests of commerce and of the fund indicated.

It is very certain that the price of gold, which reached for a moment 150, has not been carried up by any commercial demand to pay liabilities abroad or duties at home, and it is clear, therefore, that whatever aid is given to the movement, directly or indirectly, is in aid of speculation and injurious to trade. That consequence of this purpose exists, and that it derives support from the loans of banking institutions—now large deposits of gold, which is improperly counted as part of their reserve—can not be doubted. A bank which lends itself to this object, acts in direct opposition to the interests of such an institution, and in direct opposition to the interests of the country, inasmuch as every advance in the price of gold, measured by their bills, obstructs to that extent their own issues, and injures also those depositors who are to be paid in that medium. It is a clear fraud upon the trust which is devolved upon a bank to use the funds of depositors for any such purpose, and in every case in which a reasonable suspicion exists that such use of them is made, it would be the true policy to compel them to refer and better hands. The deposits of gold made by the parties to such a combination are doubtless special deposits, entitling the depositor to its return, and to count it as part of the reserve of a bank, applicable to the redemption of its circulation or the payment of its deposits, is wrong in principle and policy, and calculated to mislead the community. It can not be supported by an oath without a stain of violation of conscience and duty; but yet there are serious apprehensions that such is now the practice. The officers of a bank who pursue this course are, no doubt, held personally liable to their depositors for such an erroneous statement of their reserve, in case of any loss, and may also be held liable to the public for the transgression.

The Secretary of the Treasury, who stands between these banks and their depositors, and between them and the public, will be neglectful of his official duty unless he is regarded as supporting the depositors from sound and honest principles, if he allows any institution, subjected to public supervision, to use its power to discredit itself and the public debt, and to mislead the community by loaning upon gold thus pawned to the bank and counting it as part of its reserve. If such a blow, aimed at the credit of the Government, is unproved its repetition will be general, and destructive ultimately to the whole banking policy.

The wealth in England has reached to proportions of such magnitude as to make it evident that a large and immediate demand for supplies of food for men and animals will exist. It is believed in England that there is below the average crop, that barley and oats are very deficient, that the hay crop was light, and, what is more important, that the potato crop is failing much of the support of sheep—and the pasturage are nearly destroyed. The unusual features of sending hay to Liverpool still continues, and immediate famine, although to some quantity we may send can alleviate but little the distress which already prevails in a country so distinguished hitherto for rich and extensive pastures and for vast quantities of meat which could be had abundantly, excepting in winter, from this source. Our files by the City of Baltimore show that the withering effects of the drought still continue, and that in Russia it extends along the Black Sea, as well as the Baltic.

It is clear, therefore, that the current of gold must return to this country, and that the purchases of food and cotton, and particularly as Russia is crippled in her grain resources. If we are true to ourselves, in our financial policy and in our obedience to ocean, a career of unusual prosperity will soon be the reward of our people.

THE POPE AS MRS. PARTINGTON.

The Pope of Rome, having come to the conclusion that the world is much out of order, has summoned an Œcumenical or a General Council of his Church, to assemble on the 8th of December, 1869, and put it right. The bull in which the Pope summons the Council describes the present condition of the world, and is a very extraordinary document. To the ecclesiastically uninformed it is a remarkable social almanac. The human mind was never so active as now. The laws of nature and of society were never so vigorously explored, nor studied with so great success. The whole errors of the feudal and medieval theories of government, of trade, the fallacies of the old political and social philosophy, are rapidly exposed, and condemned by reason and experience. The scope and significance of the great law of liberty, which is the fundamental condition of progressive civilization—personal liberty and self-dependence, absolute freedom of thought and expression—are becoming constantly plainer. The bonds of ecclesiastical domination, the stock-feud enemy of progress, are every where relaxed. The essential necessity of education begins to be generally acknowledged, and the best methods are eagerly sought and diligently sought. Science facilitates industry, practically lengthens life, and elevates the soul by the revelation of the exquisite and sublime harmonies of nature. The ideal of the welfare of mankind is at a higher point of development than ever before; and the most advanced thought every where seeks to overleap a special perception of the truth that the various nations are really a fraternity, and not a series of hostile camps. In a word, however vaguely and unwisely, yet palpably and surely, the spirit of the great Christian law of a true fear of God and love of man begins to affect human society.

But the Pope of Rome sees nothing but anarchy and despair. He bewails the disregard of what he calls sacred things. With one eye upon the kingdom of Italy, he exclaims that ecclesiastical property of churches and religious houses suppressed; and with the other upon the empire of Austria, he complains that the education of children is no longer confided to the clergy, but is transferred to impious persons. He finds every where unbridled license of speech, an endless torrent of pestiferous books and newspapers, and horrible depravity of opinion. The Papal bull is a prolonged wail against the sunrise. The Pope is like nothing in history or in any position of which the imagination but Mrs. PARTINGTON painfully mopping up the Atlantic Ocean. Men will think, even about his Church. They will speak, even to expose ecclesiastical oppression. They will act, even to the rescue of countries in mortmain. They are come of age, and he wonders how he can vet hold them in the nursery. The veracious chronicler relates that a certain old hen having hatched a brood took them to walk, and was dismayed upon coming to a pond to behold her progeny making gladly for the water. The little brood launched from the shore and swam away. In vain old mother hen clucked and cluckled. Her children would not return, for she had hatched ducks, and they had found their element.

LOUISIANA.

What the rebel element of the population in Louisiana is capable of doing the New Orleans massacre proves. That it would gladly secure its supremacy by the most ruthless and bloody means is beyond doubt; nor can there be any question that the situation of the State is most critical. The only comment which the Democratic newspapers think fit to make upon the anarchy produced by men of whom the Mayor of New Orleans is representative, in a sneering ejaculation of "carpet-baggers;" that is to say, there would be no trouble if MONROE & Co. were not in power. What their way is was displayed in the massacre.

Governor WARMOUTH, of Louisiana, has made an official requisition upon the President for a military force in order to preserve order in the State. He forwards letters from various officers and citizens describing the disorder that prevails. Men are shot down in the streets and at their homes, and no efforts are made to bring the criminals to justice. One of the Judges refuses to go into a certain parish without soldiers to protect him, and the Sheriff of the same parish has resigned, owning his inability to arrest offenders. In another parish men, women, and children are murdered by bands of assassins who remain unmolested. In another, the peace is preserved only by armed bodies of volunteer citizens. The Governor estimates that a hundred and fifty men have been murdered in the State during the last month and a half; that a secret organization, hostile to the colored population, has been formed with the intention of exterminating the colored vote; that it was its known intention to assassinate, under certain circumstances, the Lieutenant-Governor and the Speaker of the House; and that it is organized to meditates a bloody revolution.

The facts of the recent history of the State, and the probabilities of the case, all confirm the Governor's representations, and the duty of the President is plain. He must take every means to preserve order in Louisiana. Nor can he plead, as at the time of the New Orleans massacre, that he does not understand the facts, and has not been warned in time. He has heard WADE HAMPTON, at a public meeting, recommending the coercion of the colored vote in South Carolina, and he knows, as every body else knows, what that means. Louisiana will gladly follow WADE HAMPTON'S counsel.

Meantime it is well to remember that it is to the class against whose crimes upon loyal citizens Governor WARMOUTH invokes aid of the President that the Democratic party proposes to give exclusive political power in the State, and intrust the rights and the welfare of the orderly and patriotic population.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION.

A late incident in Connecticut has not been sufficiently considered in connection with the revolutionary spirit of the Democratic party. It has been long known that the Connecticut election, happening in New Haven, and in parts of the State easily accessible from New York, have been shamefully fraudulent. The Legislature at its recent session passed a law to purify elections by careful registry and a proper issue of naturalization papers. The bill was rigidly examined and vigorously discussed. It was opposed with watchfulness by the Democratic party, and finally passed by a strictly party vote of the Republicans. The Democrats generally refused to register and all attempts failed at the ballot. The point in our whole system which should be most watchfully defended is the one which they strive to leave most exposed. That is the point of fraud. The Democratic party is recruited not from the intelligent youth of the country but from the most ignorant class of foreign immigrants; and the introduction of the crowded round upon intelligence, residence, and honesty at the polls is, therefore, a limitation of the Democratic vote. When the bill in question passed the Connecticut Legislature the Democratic newspapers threatened violent resistance, especially in New Haven, the scene of the chief election frauds.

The bill was signed in the office of the Secretary of State, and just before it was laid before the Governor for his signature it was discovered that the words of the law had been secretly changed, so as to deprive it of its most effective and desirable provisions. These forgeries, moreover, were substantially the changes which the Democratic party has attempted to introduce into the bill. The law was redrawn as originally passed, and was again adopted by the Legislature. The incident illustrates the utterly unscrupulous and dangerous spirit of the party which nominates for Vice-President a man who furiously appeals to the sword as a political remedy—which counts among its leaders the most relentless of rebels, and among its supporters the grave mass of the most ignorant and reckless of population. The Democratic party, despising equal rights, is found every where identified with acts and measures which are the most base and which poison the very springs of law and organized society.

LITERARY.

"The Moonstone," by Wilkie Collins, was concluded in Harper's Weekly two weeks ago, and is one of the most remarkable and fascinating of recent tales. The character of the plot, the consummate skill of the handling, and the unabated interest of the story, are alike striking. Mr. Collins is the only eminent novelist of the time who rests his work upon the ingenuity of the plot and its development. All his characters and scenes are subordinated to this. Love itself, the master-passion, is only an accessory of the mystery. The weekly numbers of his tales are seized with the eagerness with which an important letter is opened and read, or rather devoured. Yet, if the chief interest is in the development of the plot, there is often a very vivid portrayal of character in Mr. Collins's novels. Count Fosco, in "The Woman in White," is an instance of this; but in one of the most successful individual creations of the day. And in "The Moonstone" the character of Miss Clack, although less delicately drawn, and with a feeling of animosity which is artistically injurious, is yet a forcible type, and very sure to be remembered. We promise every reader a most exciting and entertaining story in "The Moonstone." Nor ought we to omit a word of especial praise for the illustrations, which are many, and which are drawn with the most sympathetic appreciation of the text, and often with a poetic delicacy and fancy which give to the stories an air of actual narrative. The brief description of a shipwreck in "Captain Curlew's Dilemma" is a vivid and picturesque as any that can be found. If the form is slight and the tone almost careless, the sincerity and knowledge and over-feeling make these little stories a series of Yankee sea-side idyls; and we shall have a right to be seriously disappointed if the hand that has given us "Captain Curlew" does not redeem the pledge of this delightful little volume.

AFTER A HOT DAY.

IT is one of the necessary misfortunes of all poor residents of a great city that they are always distant—by time, space, or pecuniary conditions—from those breathing-places—the country or the sea-shore. The problems of houses and country sites and watering-places for the poor, we fear, will never be practically solved. Houses have been planned but never built; country sites are as dear as city lots; the means of transportation to the convenient sea-shore are inadequate and illy regulated. Our nearest approach to success in the furnishing of the people with a breathing-place is the establishment of Central Park. But though this is a great suc-

ON THE DOCKS AFTER A HOT DAY.

THE LATE GENERAL HALPINE.

THE LATE GEN. HALPINE.

CHARLES G. HALPINE, Register of New York, Editor of the Citizen, and formerly a Brevet Brigadier-General in the Volunteer Army, but better known by his nom de plume of "MILES O'REILLY," died suddenly on August 3, aged 39.

General HALPINE was a native of Ireland, but came to this country in 1846. He settled first at Boston, and was associated with B. P. SHILLABER ("Mrs. Partington") in the publication of a literary paper. He subsequently served on the Boston Pilot, New York Herald, New York Times, etc. His first literary venture was a book of "Poems by the Letter H." He was the author of the famous poem, "Stanzas to the American Flag," which began:

"True down the flaunting lie!"

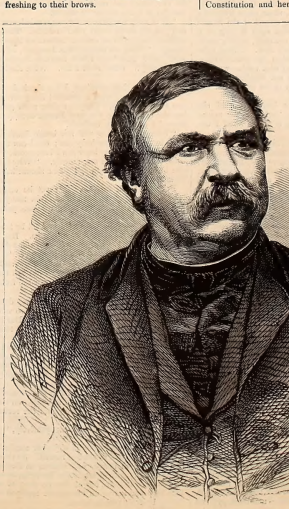
and which, published in the Tribune, was for a long time thought to have been an inspiration of Mr. GREELEY'S.

The nom de plume under which he was best known was assumed by General HALPINE in a communication written from the South to the New York Herald. It was a long and entirely fictitious account of the arbitrary imprisonment of a private named "MILES O'REILLY," who had offended General GILMORE by praising Admiral DUPONT in a poem which was circulated in camp. The writer in his next letter gave a copy of the verses, which caused great merriment wherever they were read. This performance was the first to bring the Irish lyrist before the public; and when, a few months afterward, the witty wag published to the world a full-page account of a reception-dinner given to MILES O'REILLY at DELMONICO'S, whereat Mayor HOFFMAN sang a comic song, and other well-known dignitaries indulged in ridiculous speeches, his reputation was made, and in a short time the name of MILES O'REILLY was a household word.

cess, it is hardly the poor who are most benefited by it; the means of getting there are still too high and inadequate; and it is rather the wealthy, after all, who enjoy its beauties. The poor are still compelled to seek other and less pleasant and healthy breathing-places. We have shown in former issues that the majority of these are not the most delightful localities; and have before pleaded for the inauguration of steps to relieve the pent-up poor.

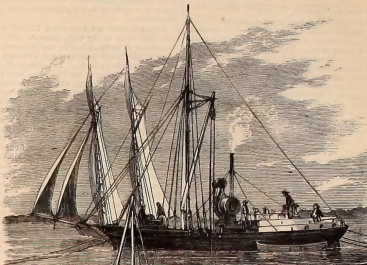
Among the most favored and frequented spots are the docks on East and North rivers, and any evening after the present hot days the numerous docks may be seen crowded with loungers, as is the one represented in our engraving on page 532. They are by no means always clean; the perfumes wafted on the air from neighboring ships are not always those of Arabia; the characters who haunt the docks are not always unexceptionable; yet with sundown of each sultry day come hundreds of men, women, and children to these docks for the sea air, which comes tainted perhaps, but still cooling and refreshing to their brows.

FRANCIS DEAK.



FRANCIS DEAK, the man to whom Hungary is most indebted for the restoration of her old Constitution and her rights under the present Austrian Government, has lately become again prominent in Austrian politics, and, a few weeks since, made one of those telling speeches which end arguments and settle questions. We give in this number of the Weekly a portrait of this famous Hungarian leader. DEAK was born at Kechida, in the year 1803. In the earliest years of his boyhood he was remarkable for quick intelligence, and the aptitude he evinced in his scholastic studies. At college he attained high distinction; and in the year 1832 he was elected to the Diet by the Zalner Comitat, which he represented until the year 1836.

DEAK is a man of the strictest integrity of principle. Of this he afforded evidence in 1843, when he preferred relinquishing his trust as a deputy to giving utterance to a word which his conscience could not fully approve.



In 1844 he traveled in various parts of the Continent, and in 1847 the state of his health induced him to decline being elected a deputy. Meanwhile he maintained an active correspondence with the Liberal party in his native country; and when, in the spring of 1848, Count LOUIS BATTHYANI formed a Hungarian Ministry, DEAK accepted the port-folio of Justice. On the dissolution of BATTHYANI'S Ministry he retired into private life, and occupied himself in the pursuit of literature and science.

The year 1861 again called him into the arena of political action; and from that time until the reconciliation of king and people was effected in 1866, DEAK was the recognized leader of the Moderate National party in Hungary, the policy pursued by whom has now been crowned with success. DEAK has been offered office, honors, and wealth by FRANCIS JOSEPH, who has even condescended to pay personal visits to the man who was once his stanchest opponent; but the patriot has declined them all, preferring to have it recorded of him—as assuredly it will be recorded—that he served his country for herself alone.

In manner DEAK is unassuming and even diffident, and he possesses a wonderful amount of calmness and self-command. These last-mentioned qualities, together with his powerful eloquence, have enabled him to influence and even to control the turbulent spirits of his countrymen in the most excited times.

THE INDIANS OF NEW MEXICO.

WE give on pages 532 a picture representing the head chiefs of the Capote Utahs and the Jicarilla Apache Indians of New Mexico, with their agent and interpreters. This party of Indians are about to start from Abiquiu, New Mexico, west of the Rio Grande River, with Governor W. F. M. ARNY, into the unexplored region west of the San Juan River, and which lies between that stream and the Colorado River of the Pacific slope. The object of the expedition is to thoroughly explore that country, with the view of locating the Utahs and Jicarilla Apaches upon a reservation outside of the settlements.

Governor ARNY has the confidence of these Indians, and is urging in their behalf that a treaty should be made with all the Indian tribes of New Mexico. He advocates the adoption of a treaty requiring each tribe to cultivate peaceful relations with all other tribes, and binding them to cease hostilities with all tribes who are at peace with the United States; to relinquish the right they claim to roam where they please in the District, and granting them, in consideration of the relinquishment of this right, a certain specified tract of land as their reservation, the boundaries of which should be defined, and the Indians be required to remain on it; the American and Mexican citizens excluded therefrom, except when permitted by the agent. The treaty should give the Indians a reasonable compensation for the relinquishment of their claimed rights, in annual payments, not in money, but in clothing, provisions, cattle, sheep, horses, and farming implements, etc., etc., as would be necessary for their comfort, and enable them to cultivate the soil and manufacture their own clothing. Governor ARNY urges that an Industrial School should be established on the reservation; that in the treaty it should be specified that all children between such ages and such years of age should be placed in the school to be educated; the Government agreeing that during that period the children should be clothed and fed, and the Indians to agree that the children shall labor at least three hours per day under the direction of the agent.

The Jicarilla Apaches number about one thousand persons, and the different bands of Utahs number over five thousand fighting men, who have studied the art of Indian warfare to perfection.

THE YACHT CLUB PRIZES.

WE represent on page 533 the solid silver prizes manufactured by Messrs. TIFFANY & CO., of this city, for the New York Yacht Club, and which are to be sailed for during the August cruise of the squadron.

The designs are exquisite, and the ornamentation, in engraving or relief, is perfectly appropriate for the object of the prizes. The winneeder is of fine proportion, made somewhat after the fashion of a ship's bucket, supported by four feet, on which dolphins in bass-relief sport in silver waves. This is richly ornamented with a finely wrought border of chain pattern, between which and the base is engraved a representation of a yacht under sail. A second piece is a superb and graceful punch-bowl, of which each handle represents a youthful Neptune holding his symbolic trident. Three equi-distant dolphins heads support the upright handle of the cover, while on either side, from a flat chasing of ivy leaves, spring wings of Speed, terminating in holding a shield or disc, on which is to be inscribed the winner's name.

The tankard and two cups are of novel and unique design. The lid of the tankard is well set off by a statuette, in annealed silver, of a sailor standing by the side of a capstan, and the handle is similarly adorned by two foal anchors and a block. Each cup is made in the form of a capstan, around which the end of the handle of (silver) rope are ingeniously twined.

The tankard, three cups, and waiter are among the very finest works of the kind that it has ever been our pleasure to behold, and the recipient may well feel proud to have won such beautiful trophies. The general form of the tankard, cups, and waiter are Roman, though not so severely classic as to seem strange to our modernized eyes. The chasing known as repoussé for beauty of design and excellent finish deserves the greatest praise. In all these works the effect is marvelously heightened by the judicious disposition of the polished and matted grounds.

POPULATION OF LONDON.

THE City of London, comprising about ninety small parishes, is less than one square mile in area; whereas the whole metropolis, in all its vastness, reaches nearly a hundred and twenty square miles. The City can not enlarge, seeing that it is hemmed in on all sides. It can not increase in population, unless ordinary dwellinghouses increase in number or in height. The process has been just the reverse of this. Merchant banks and insurance offices now occupy spots on which whole blocks of dwelling-houses used to stand. The Bank of England, the Royal Exchange, and other public buildings have similarly done their work as house-destroyers. From these causes the population of the City—reaching those who sleep and have their homes in the City—is gradually decreasing; and there can be little doubt that this process has continued, making the City a concentrated place of business only. There are more churches and chapels, more clergymen and ministers, in this square mile of ground than on any equal area in the Queen's dominions. There are more charities under education in proportion to the population. There are more customs duties, more commerce, more single profits (or deemed by income tax) more shipping, higher rents, more ratable annual value, in proportion to the population, than any where else.

Although there are only about 110,000 persons who sleep in the City, there are 280,000 who belong to it, to all intents and purposes, as being regularly and daily engaged, occupied, or employed within its limits. In other words, of the whole population of the City about forty per cent. dwell there at night, while the remaining sixty per cent. quit the place after the close of business hours to go to their domestic firesides elsewhere. Nearly three-fifths of those who make their money in the City spend it out of the City. These three-fifths comprise, almost to a man, the mercantile and commercial class, employed, and employed. Taking twelve business hours, from six in the morning till six in the evening, 549,613 persons enter the realm of the City of London; in the sixteen hours between five in the morning and nine in the evening the number reaches 670,744. Then in the night of twenty-four hours the number very nearly touches three-quarters of a million—728,986! In other words, a mass of persons not far short of twice the entire population of twenty cities—Oxford, Chichester, Worcester, Winchester, Wells, Peterborough, Ripon, Llandaff, Bangor, Lincoln, Lichfield, Durham, Exeter, Gloucester, Hereford, Canterbury, Carlisle, Chester, Bangor, Ely, and Lisbon—enter the City of London every day.

A CHANGE.

PARTING the dusky draperies of sleep
My sorrow stood, a vision with calm eyes,
Not robed in her remembered mournful guise,
Nor pallid as from tears she could not weep,
But fair, exceeding wise.

"What change is here?" I marveled, and she drew Closer, with quiet, to my thin bed.
Her hand was like a sunbeam on my head,
Weightless and warm; her kiss was pure as dew.

"Call me thy friend," she said.

THE DOUBLE MISTAKE.

BERTHA BELL ran down stairs with her hat and gloves in her hand.

"I will be ready in a minute, Cousin Paley!" she called, stopping an instant at the open door.

"All right! so will I!" returned Cousin Paley, following her into the sitting-room, with a gun in his hand. "I will leave you to mind my dinner, Aunt Bethiah. I shall go out for another shot at ducks, when Bertha and I come back, before I go home. It is loaded with a double charge all ready."

As he spoke he placed the gun behind a small table, which, as it moved, was overturned, spilled and fell over. Instantly there was a flash, a crash, and a scream from Aunt Bethiah as well as Bertha. The room was full of smoke and powder, and somebody fell heavily upon the floor. It was Bertha, who a moment before stood laughing and gathering her hat and gloves.

And so in an instant all the colors of the day had changed. Instead of a ride with his pretty young cousin, and dining the country-side, Paley Fairbrother jumped into the waiting chaise and rode in all haste for Doctor Peel. And in just one hour after she ran so gayly down the staircase Bertha Bell lay white and still on her mother's bed, with a small ball of ether in the room and no right foot. The chaise, driven by Jim, had entirely shattered it, and there was no question about amputating and losing necessary.

Bertha was brave as one of the early martyrs, and hopeful as a rainbow; but poor Cousin Paley was in the deep of gloom, remorse, and despair.

"It was I that did it, Aunt Bethiah. I was! I! Oh! Aunt Bethiah, I don't dare go home. I don't dare see my mother. What will she say to me? she was always so opposed to my touching a gun," he said.

Now, as it happened, Paley Fairbrother's mother was my own next neighbor in the city; and just at nightfall of that unfortunate day I heard, out in my back garden, the sound of some one ringing up the grape-vines, a sound of violent weeping in the adjoining yard; and looking through the lattice, I saw Mrs. Fairbrother herself crying with all her heart.

"Some of the family must be dead," thought I, though in my own I did not venture to take fright at my neighbor Fairbrother's tears, for they flowed with the same readiness if a piece a pin's cipie were in danger. But this time it seemed something and had happened.

"Why, what is the matter, Mrs. Fairbrother?" I asked.

"Oh, Mrs. Lindey! it is too dreadful to tell!" she sobbed; and then went right on to tell it. "Paley is in the house now, crying as hard as he can cry," said she.

Just then Paley himself came to the door, his handsome boyish face flushed and stained with boyish tears.

"It was all my fault, Mrs. Longley!" said he. "All my fault: and now I shall spend every cent I ever earn, excepting just enough to live on, for Cousin Bertha. And as soon as she can wear it, I shall buy the most beautiful foot for her that can be made; and if I ever marry, I shall marry her," he continued, with the generous impulses of a boy and the satisfied assurance of a man.

Months after this I saw a carriage stop before neighbor Fairbrother's door, and pretty Bertha Bell taken out in her cousin Paley's arms, and carried into the house.

A sweet-faced girl, only sixteen, and far enough from looking upon her life as blighted and over, as I perceived when I had once seen her happy eyes and heard her glad laugh.

"Every body is so good to me," said she, gayly. "I believe, on the whole, I am well paid for my foot. Only think, Mrs. Longley, of a Second Street lady I never saw sending me such an elegant bouquet as this! And then the fruit I have had from entire strangers! And my friends! why, none of them go say where but they are sure to give me something beautiful or useful for me. I could not be waited on more tenderly if I were the Princess Royal; and as for Cousin Paley!"

Bertha finished her sentence by a loving look at Paley Fairbrother, and he returned it with one so tender and profound in its way that I thought to myself, it was not likely to be a heavy trial to the young man to take care of his cousin Bertha all their lives.

At last she was ready for the new foot—"the most beautiful foot that could be made."

"It is splendid, Mrs. Lindey!" said Paley, who was a great friend of mine. "Dr. Peel does not allow her to wear it longer than half an hour at a time now at first, but she can walk with it just as nice as can be. She is a little slow starting, but after that you wouldn't notice a thing different, and you will say so when you see her."

I saw her, and I did say so. Bertha could even run down the steps at ease, and was soon to take her place again in the kingdom of youth and beauty.

The sun rose and the sun set, the earth turned restlessly over and over on its axis, and traveled around and around the patient sun, and Bertha kept on growing well, while Paley grew more and more tireless in the devotion which was at once fatherly, brotherly, and lover-like.

In all this time Paley had been no outside changes to me and mine more important than new pavements and lines of horse-railways in the city, and new gardens and tea-cups and saucers in the country. But of a sudden every thing began to happen, until it seemed as though the very house-tops of the world had fallen out. When, at last, life settled again into an everyday level, nothing was unchanged only that I still lived in part of the old house with one servant instead of four, and only my niece Lucy for company. In the general wreck of friends and fortune Lucy alone had been spared; but, although she had lost every thing else, she had kept her joyous heart, and she came to me cheerful as a cricket on my hearth.

Mrs. Fairbrother remained my next neighbor, and as she was always at hand to weep with those in trouble, I had a great deal of sympathy and kindness from her, as also from Paley, with whom I was as great friends as ever.

One day I saw Paley come in through the gate that opened in the lattice between our yards. She had a basket of early lettuce and pepper-grass in her hand, for I was in bed with a fever.

"I have brought you a taste of my lettuce, Mrs. Longley, and I hope it will not prove so tough you can not eat it," said she in her self-deprecating way, setting down the basket and getting herself down with a gentle sigh.

I saw at once that there was one matter, and that the lettuce was only an excuse for coming in; for my neighbor Fairbrother, though we were back and forth, had never come without a distinct errand. But the errand of the lettuce being disposed of and dwelt upon as long as it would possibly bear, still she staid, sighing now and then with a cloudy look. I tried talking about Bertha and Paley-bad, her ten chickens, and the poor luck she had had with washer-women, but the right thing was not touched on, and the trouble remained. I began to see as a bit of undissolved camphor-gum.

"Do you know, Mrs. Longley," said she at last, with a sigh, "what is the matter with Paley? Something is on his mind I can see.

"Why no, why do you think so?" I returned, not much startled, for something is always on somebody's mind according to Mrs. Fairbrother, be it tough steak or a bill of California-plant beer, knowing that drinking was a sort of mispriced panacea to her. It made but little difference what; but Paley, who was under-ground, sage, wake-robin, or the best Bohea. As she sighed, said she was not sure but she could live without eating; and as for drinking, experience she could without sleeping; but she must drink.

Accordingly her face brightened as she sipped the beer, but she still looked troubled dismally.

"Paley has fits of shutting himself up in his own room, and I can't find out for why," said she, plaintively; "and when I try to cheer him up by sending him in to talk to you and Lucy he makes some excuse not to come. He seems to get out of himself, and I can see he is all not right. It may be his liver; but if not his liver, something is on his mind. I have tried trying a little camomile-tea into his coffee. That is excellent for any stomach difficulty, and Paley won't ever take medical drinks—not if he knows it; and I have tried strategem when I see what he needs. I knew a little thorough-wort would do him no hurt any way, and it might touch his case; but it does not seem to."

Then she gave her bonnet another despairing shake and began to finishing her beer.

"You come in to tea-night, you and Lucy, and see what you think," she added, putting down the glass and rising.

Accordingly Lucy and I went in to tea; but Paley did not appear till after we were seated at the table, although we heard him go up stairs an hour before, and his mother had called him three times. But I perceived at once that this time his mother was not in the least altogether fidget. Paley did really look troubled and unhappy; and although he tried hard to seem unchanged and gay, it was plain to see that the effort was a failure. Mrs. Fairbrother was right. He was either ill or in trouble; but I knew Paley well enough to know the more one tried to find out the matter the less one would know, and there was nothing but to stand aside and be sorry for him without showing it.

So I talked over the last magazines, the price of strawberries, and the prospect for grapes; and Paley tried to keep the deadly look out of his face and talk with me, till I pitied him clear through my heart, while I pretended to be only criticising the cut and color of his vest.

"It isn't a case for thorough-wort," said I to myself. "Something deeper than the liver."

Presently the door-bell rang, and Mrs. Fairbrother answering it herself, we heard her through the open parlor door crying out, "You little dear! Paley will be so glad to see you! Come right straight in!"

I happened to glance at Paley at the moment, and, having on my far-seeing glasses, was frightened at his sudden paleness. But his voice sounded natural enough as he arose a moment after and spoke cordially to his cousin Bertha, whom Mrs. Fairbrother brought in with the air of bringing a pleasant surprise.

Bertha came without any trace of lameness, and with such a sweet face and charming manner that one wished she were a baby to be taken up and kissed. We all did just like her, to be sure, even to Paley, who met her with a grave and gentle cordiality very becoming to him. But still, though he sat by and talked with her all the evening through, with eyes and ears for no one else, the same sad weight kept down his spirits.

Even my niece Lucy, who is not like me in being observing, noticed it. Lucy, who, always cheerful herself in her quiet way, supposed every body else to be.

There was as much difference between Bertha Bell and Lucy as between a full-blown rose and a sprig of mignonnette; but they were both as sweet as they could be, and it is hardly a matter of choice between roses and mignonnette: so, when I saw them together with Paley beside Bertha, like a bit of "boys 'love" or a geranium leaf, I felt it was a pity they should ever be apart, they set each other off so prettily. But this evening, although the Rose was brighter than ever, there seemed a sort of mist over the other two.

"What was it, Lucy?" said I, after we had gone home. "Was any thing wrong with you or Paley to-night?"

"Not with me, Aunt Jane. But Paley did not seem exactly natural. And he has not for quite a while. I think something troubles him; and a good many times lately he has begun to speak, or looked just ready to, and then turned off in a hurry. But he got very lately, either; I haven't seen him much very lately."

Then Lucy made a long pause and began to take down her hair. When she spoke again her voice was constrained by an evident effort to speak perfectly natural. "Is Paley engaged to cousin Bertha?" said she.

"Why yes, I suppose there is an understanding that amounts to an engagement," I replied, looking for her in a little surprise, but seeing nothing unusual in her face; though, to be sure, I hadn't on my far-glasses. And then I turned off to go and wrestle with Jacob.

After that I saw nothing of Paley Fairbrother for two weeks and more, and then he came in one day as I was sitting by myself.

"It is Lucy's afternoon for her music lesson, and you are alone, aren't you?" said he. Then, without waiting for an answer, he went on impetuously: "I can not bear it, Mrs. Longley; what shall I do? It is Lucy I love, and it is Bertha I must marry! What shall I do? What shall I do?"

I was more than surprised, I was shocked.

"Why, Paley! what a dreadful thing this is you are telling me! Lucy is a dear good girl, but she doesn't love you, and Bertha does, you know, I dare say, and, fickling!"

"I know it, and I will not break Bertha's heart by marrying my body else; but I can not be so false to Lucy as to marry her when I love her." Then he turned upon me, fiercely. "Why did you bring Lucy in my way? You should have known better!"

Poor boy! It was dreadful; yet he could take out no patent on his suffering, for many a one has gone through the turn feet along the same painful road before him.

"It is too hard," said he, "I can not be true to myself without being false to Lucy, for I shall never marry. No, never! And some day I shall be dead, and then it will be all over."

As he spoke he rose and walked about, and, looking out, he started up and went through the garden door as Lucy came in through the front door.

After that I tried, of course, to keep my dear girl out of Paley's sight, and succeeded so well that for a month or two I saw no more of him than in the time Bertha Bell came often, and at last took Lucy home with her for a week.

At the end of that time I was invited out to spend a day, and found Bertha's mother, whom I knew very well, in an anxious, overburdened woman, as fussy and full of melancholy foreboding as her sister Bertha.

Her face was not only spirited as it was expected to be; a piece of cloth spread over it on the grass showed signs of mildew; and the robins were eating all her cherries.

"Sometimes I think," said she, pensively, "it doesn't pay to live."

But when Bertha came in sight her mother's cloudy face cleared in spite of herself. So thoroughly sweet in temper and manner as Bertha always was, her unmerited imposition of sorrows and troubles to move her as they do those of us who keep our nerves on the outside ready to be jarred by every passing touch; and

"There is nothing on her mind, that is certain, and I am thankful for it. Paley has not been help-worthy, and it would be a sin to take all the sunshine out of her sky," said I to myself, remembering that

"Lightest hearts
Make sometimes heaviest mourning."

So when, on our way home, Lucy told me the wedding-day of Bertha and Paley was appointed, I was, on the whole, glad he had thought better of his determination never to marry.

"They will be very happy together. It is a good thing," said I, heartily.

"I hope so," returned Lucy, with such a little sigh that I should have heard it, only I had on my fur-glasses, and they quickened all my senses.

Then I fell to wondering why Lucy sighed, and was very glad it was not for herself, but, before I had time to ask her, she added, "Bertha wishes me to speak with her, Aunt Jane."

"By no means. I can not consent to such a thing," I answered, decidedly, thinking of the mockery it would be to poor Paley.

"I did not want to, but Bertha was so anxious, and thought it should be such a comfort, I didn't know but I ought," returned Lucy.

"Bertha will need no comfort in her bridal," I replied, severely vexed by the ignorant girlishness that understood so little at what price her happiness was bought.

Half-way back to the city we met Paley Fairbrother going out to see his bride; and the same evening as we sat by ourselves—Lucy crocheting silk-stockings for her bridal girl to Bertha, and I thinking of poor Paley and his unsatisfied heart—Paley himself tapped at the half-open door, and quietly walked in upon us.

I looked up in surprise, and was still more surprised when I saw the unburdened and even radiant look on his face, mingled yet with the unrest of anxious doubt.

"I could wait no longer," he said, in a sudden burst, "before speaking to Lucy. Bertha is such an angel! And there I was, the wickedest hypocrite that ever lived, going to offer her my heart, me under the load that I loved her best of all the world! I thought I was acting from generosity. She felt bound to me, and meant to be faithful, but it was only conscientious, Mrs. Langley! nothing else. She could not be such shame by her own noble courage and truth. Oh! she is an angel! It was wrong, and, to marry with a lie in one's mouth, and I had a right to know that she had loved Percy Hathaway—that high-school tech-er at Linsley, you know—last summer. But ever since I told her all he spoke to her, and then she never gave him a word of encouragement. She felt bound to me, and meant to be faithful, only she could not begin with a falsehood in her mouth, and thought I had a right to know. She is an angel! I don't think her blue eyes ever looked when she said that. I had to kiss her on the spot, and then I told her my story. And now if Lucy will not love me I don't know what I shall do!"

As he spoke in his boyish vehemence and manly passion Lucy went and took white, and red again, without saying a word or looking up, while I was dumb as she.

Presently Paley spoke again. "Speak, Lucy, won't you? I don't know what I shall do if you will not love me," he repeated, earnestly.

Poor Lucy looked shyly up. "I never could see how Bertha could love any body better than Paley, but I didn't tell her so."

Poor Lucy! it seemed, with all my gratification, and in spite of my fur-glasses, that it was she who had been wearing the crown of fire, after all. But, encouraging Paley's supposition of the truth true womanly interest—which is compound —she had been sole confidante of Bertha's mistaken attachment during her long days of sympathy, and keeping her secrets so closely over it, that no blind wisdom, did not even discover that she had any secrets to keep. But "When the shire is won at last,

Who will count the billows passed?"

Not long after this evening there was a double wedding at St. Paul's Church, and I sat in the first pew, with my neighbor Fairbrother wiping her eyes in great delight upon one side of me, and Mrs. Bell sighing out her thanksgivings upon the other; while I looked through my glasses at the happy bride, and said to myself, how much better the truth serves one than a lie!

JAPANESE WRITING.

JAPANESE writing is very free and flowing, and well deserves the term "cursive," which is usually applied to it. Like printing, it is in vertical columns commencing at the right-hand side of the page. Although this method of writing does not appear to admit of so much variety in the shaping of the letters as the horizontal system, it is very rapidly done, and looks very characteristic. It is difficult for a student to "copy" an original style at first sight, and the variations of handwriting always cause written characters to be less easily intelligible than printed matter. Pens and ink are the materials now used: a brush, consisting of a nicely arranged bunch of hair, finely pointed, in a handle of bamboo, is passed along a stone, on which some Indian ink has been rubbed down with water. The writing-paper is porous, and easily receives and retains the characters lightly and rapidly painted on it by the writer.

What renders it difficult to speak and write Japanese correctly is, that the phraseology varies according to the position in life and relationship of the person addressed. A Japanese lady, when conversing with her female relatives, uses a different choice of words from what she would do when she is addressing her wife with the relatives or to her servants. To fail or to misplace these expressions betrays a want of refinement and education which is considered highly reprehensible by the practised ear; and thus one may be well acquainted with the colloquial language of the common people, and yet be unable to address those of higher rank.

In reference to writing, it may be mentioned that post-offices exist in all Japanese towns and cities except "Jeddo," the capital, of the Tycoon. The postage of a letter from "Simonoseki" to Jeddo (for letters are received there, though there is no public address where they can be dispatched) is two tempos (about seven pence-halfpenny). The distance is over 300 miles, therefore the tariff is very much higher than what our fathers used to pay. In a country where money is worth so much as it is in Japan it is sufficiently high to prevent a very large correspondence being carried on, but the means of communication is always available.

THE AMERICAN ARMY.*

To create, command, and disband a great army are among the most difficult acts of a free government.

At the period of the inauguration of Lincoln, the United States were really without an army. The insignificant force which had recently passed under that name had been dissipated by the perfidy of Floyd, the Secretary of War; the most important portion of it had been disarmed and destroyed in Texas by the treason of General Twiggs.

At the close of the war the army numbered about 1,050,000 men. Such was its strength when it was disbanded.

Enthusiasm prevailed in the beginning what seemed to be an adequate supply of volunteers. But enthusiasm can not be relied upon as a steady principle of action, and this was speedily exhausted, and, under the influence of adversity, as quickly subsides.

Men were next obtained by the allurement of bounties, and, as a necessarily failing of its purpose, they were taken by draft.

The quality of the force thus arising changed with the changes of the war. As the expectanced military eye, the troops in the national service up to the spock of the battle of Bull Run consisted of an armed multitude, but not an army. Then it became evident that something more effective was necessary. Many months were consumed, and the skill of a master-spirit, General McClellan, was exhausted; sunditest supplies were lavished; but, though a great improvement was manifested, the military eye was far from being reached. Not without the utmost difficulty, and after many disasters, were the political judgments of the country at last corrected. It was in the West that the army first became what an army ought to be—a mere cores of human destruction, a machine, governed by mathematical precision along any given line, and brought to bear irresistibly on any given point. In the judgment of a vast majority, especially, this degree of perfection was first manifested in General Grant's campaign from Grand Gulf to Vicksburg.

To attain to this, an army must have lost all outward political thought; it must have implicit reliance on the mind which is guiding it. It must have complete cohesion in all its parts, from that tenacity results. Each soldier must thoroughly feel that, no matter how unfavorable as a single individual may be, he is absolutely sustained in what he is about to do by the unbroken power and unbroken will of the whole force. The highest excellence is reached when the converse of this conception is attained, and the individual soldier feels himself to be responsible for the safety and honor of the whole army may be depending. In the wars of Napoleon the Imperial Guard had become such a force. It was, it is not by the pageantry of reviews that this grand ideal is reached; the perfect soldier, like his own weapon, must have passed through the ordeal of fire.

Considering the military condition of the nation when General Grant assumed command, the formation and organization of the great Army of the Potomac, the time consumed in bringing that force into a satisfactory condition, were by no means too long. The preceding paragraphs show how much was necessary to be done and how much was done. Unquestionably, had not the resources furnished without stint by Congress McClellan created that army. Events showed that he must have organized it so well that he could not use it on the battle-field.

Events also showed that McClellan's solution on the Peninsula of the [illegible] of war was incorrect. He did not recognize the importance of the Mississippi Valley, and looked upon military operations there as only secondary in importance. Though the force he had accumulated was already unmanageable in his hands, he constantly importuned the government to strip it! Western armies of whatever they could for the sake of adding to his own. Unnecessary as the force finally never was an army in the world so lavishly supplied as that of the Potomac before the Peninsular campaign. The Secretary of War, who knew the state of things well, declared, in his testimony before the Congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War, "that there never was an army in the world supplied as well as ours. I believe a French army of half the size could be supplied with what we were."

While these things were lavished on the Army of the East, no superfluities were given to the Army of the West. The testimony before the same Congressional Committee, General Pope testified that the Western army had labored under a great many disadvantages, but it had always pursued an aggressive policy from the beginning. So far as material was concerned, it was indifferent to the government how with the Army of the East: he added, "We had nothing, you might say; I have seen men go into action there with the locks of their muskets tied on with strings. . . . I have seen them wearing overcoats to hide their nakedness, as they had no pantaloons. When I left there there were some troops that had been there one year, and yet had but two or three ambulances to a regiment of a thousand men." To the question, "Was it all appropriated for the Army of the Potomac?" he replied, "I do not say what became of it. I do not know that it had an existence; at least we never saw it. Our troops suffered very much, and I must say that it was understood by them to have been from neglect on the part of the government."

It was the man in the overcoat, with the look of his rifle tied on with a string, who won victories—not the pampered, neatly-uniformed soldier.

I shall close this chapter by quoting some instructive remarks on the unusual number of the Civil War. They occur in a communication made to me by one of the greatest and most successful of the generals. "Our paper armies were very large, while the officers and men for actual duty were small in comparison. As a rule, in a well-ordered army, if sixty-six per cent. of the men 'present' can be brought into battle, it is a good average; the other thirty-three per cent. are employed as cooks, teamsters, nurses, servants, etc., etc.—are sick, on furlough, detached. Then the men reported as the 'present' are the depots, prisons, hospitals, detachments, escorts, etc., etc.; make fearful blanks in every regiment and subdivision of the army. Sometimes not more than 40 or 45 per cent. of the men receiving pay were engaged with the fighting armies at the front, and this half was subjected to the heavy consumption of the thirty-three per cent. before mentioned, so that in an army whose muster-rolls would give 100,000 men present and fit for duty, 50,000 to 60,000 could expect to bring into battle, at any distance from his base of supplies, more than 35,000 men. By the 1st of December, 1864, I take the case at the close of the war, when for the first time we got at the real facts and figures, 1,050,000 men were then on the muster-rolls to be paid off and discharged.

"The active fighting armies then were:

General Grant's armies	80,000
Sherman at Raleigh	65,000
Thomas at Nashville	55,000
Canby at Mobile and in the Southwest	30,000
Wilson's cavalry in Alabama	15,000
Stoneman in East Tennessee	8,000
Sheridan in Shenandoah	40,000
West of Mississippi (Missouri and Arkansas)	16,000
	257,000

Where were all the rest?

"Guarding thousands of miles of sea-coast, rivers, and roads, guarding prisoners, and forming provost guards, and drawing about the country. I do not mention this in criticism, but to show how in war sixths become guinea do arise, and how little the country overestimates the exact strength of armies from the official returns.

"At no time during the late Civil War could we use it 1864, the time of the greatest pressure—do I believe that fifty per cent. of the men borne on the rolls were actually present for the striking distance of the enemy. To this cause may be traced some of the worst failures, when the government was the people behind pushed their officers 'on,' supposing that figures could handle muskets and fight battles."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

It is a great source of comfort and satisfaction, as well as of safety, that we can speak proud in the city to know that some progress is being made every week in the work of cleansing the streets, in the gathering or removing various nuisances. Many of the most filthy and unhealthy localities in the city have been disinfected by being liberally sprinkled with a solution of carbolic acid and sulphate of iron. Investigations have been made among the dwelling-houses and tenements of both and East rivers, and it is said that the unpleasant effluvia arising from those places is due to the fact that no open bottles and that if close steam tanks were used no offensive odors could escape. The multitudes who have been deprived of their usual fresh air by the manner in which this business has been conducted will be glad to be informed that the Sanitary Committee charged certain responsible persons with the duty of closely observing these establishments hereafter, and that the penalty of fifty dollars on the business will be invoked on the first complaint from them. This regulation should be made known far and wide.

A compromise has been at length agreed upon between the Board of Health and the butchers, which it is believed will in a measure bring about a very desirable change, without any unnecessary pecuniary loss to a very worthy industrial class. The butchers have consented to the regulation that no slaughtering shall be done on the premises where the animals are sold after the 1st of [illegible] next to remove their slaughter-houses from the city, to attach to every butcher's shop in the mean time to any regulation or ordinance, the enforcement of which may be deemed necessary for the public health and safety, and engage to lose no time in making such arrangements that by the close of the year no slaughtering will be done except in the prescribed limits. The report of the Sanitary Inspectors states that a strict enforcement of this regulation is absolutely needful for the public health and convenience; and the matter is under consideration by the Board of Health.

Rutherford Park Hotel has been recently opened for guests. It will accommodate over two hundred, is nicely furnished, has a fine bowling-alley, reading-room, and many pleasant surroundings. The Passaic River, just in front of the hotel, is the great attraction.

One can not read a newspaper without reading accounts of deaths from drowning. If the number who have been accidentally drowned since the 1st of June were accurately stated the list would be a long one. Wherever bathing is practised suitable provision for emergencies should be made; and then such a calamity as that which occurred a week or two ago in Atlantic City, New Jersey, by which three valuable lives were lost, would scarcely be possible. A party of excursionists from Philadelphia went to spend a day of pleasure at Atlantic City, and bathing in the surf was a part of the programme. One or two of the bathers, venturing beyond their depth, called for help, but there was not even a line upon the beach. Those who attempted to rescue the sinking men perished themselves; and this catastrophe took place in broad daylight, and, as it were, in full view of a multitude of people, who were unable to render any assistance.

A case of drowning recently occurred at Fort Hamilton under peculiarly harrowing circumstances. A soldier who had been subjected to the punishment of "ball and chain" was bathing in the bay, accompanied by a guard. The ball and chain was not removed from him, nor from his companions, during the bath, although they were accompanied by a guard. This unfortunate man, either for the moment forgetting the drag which was upon him or overconfident in his strength, passed beyond his depth, and, struggling wildly to reach the pier which lay at a short distance, appeared beneath the surface. Of course assistance from his comrades was out of the question, whose movements were restricted from the guard. The body was recovered, but too late for resuscitation. The burden, rendering a verdict of accidental death by drowning, took occasion to "protest strongly against the cruelty and danger of compelling prisoners under sentence to wear the 'ball and chain' while bathing."

The Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University is becoming an increasingly important department. Practical science will make its way even in this classic; for the industrial professions of a rapidly growing country demand that help of men well educated in the natural sciences. This year twenty-five graduated at the Scientific School, and the class will probably be larger next year.

A company has been chartered under the laws of the State of New York for the purpose of constructing the tubular cable of which the body of a "flexible rubber road wagon," constructed by the company, is modeled in a single piece, without seam or joint. It is the more than one-half as heavy as an ordinary wooden wagon body, and less expensive. It is said not to shrink, crack, warp, swell, twist, or to get out without paint or varnish, and is not easily scratched.

An exchange states that "a foot mother in Cincinnati broke her arm the other day in administering a disobedient infant." She will probably try moral suasion next time.

Indian newspapers speak of a mysterious and fatal disease which is prevailing among the cattle in some sections of the country. The disease, which has been brought into the country by the Texas cattle, as to all the infected districts these cattle have either been landed or driven. The symptoms are that upon all the cows that have died there are immense numbers of ticks and lice. These ticks, it is alleged, produce the brain blood and cause inflammation and partial congestion of the lungs and pleura.

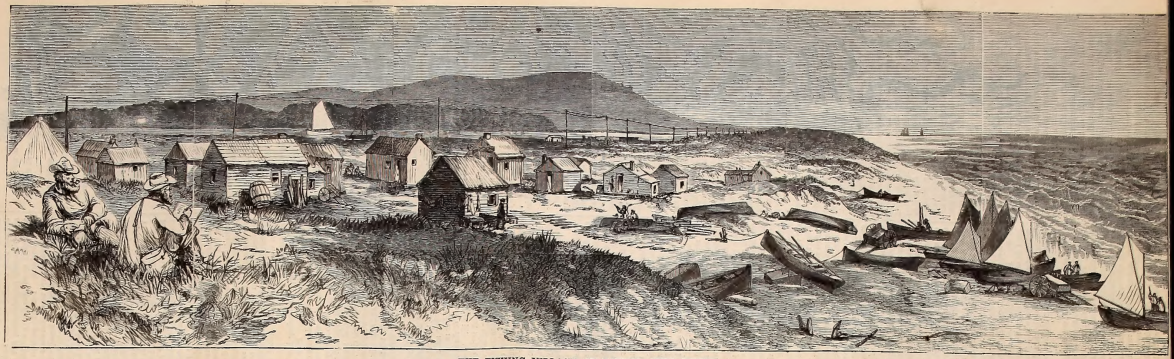
There is nothing more delightful while traveling through romantic regions than to meet by accident with some soul kindred to your own who is, like yourself, inspired by the beauties around him. The artist on a recent visit to Catskill was contemplating with rapture a rare sunset. The mountains, the valleys, the golden and purple light, and dell and mountain glittered with the reflected glories of the sky. Suddenly he perceived a man accompanied by his wife, busily turning to him, exclaimed with enthusiasm: "What a magnificent picture you have here, my dear Sir!"

"Wheelbarrow!" was the very indifferent inquiry of the stranger.

Look all around—the mountains, the heavens, the setting sun. What picture can surpass such a view?"

"Why, yes," replied the stranger, in a desperate way; "I love a picture, and if I could only raise money enough to set up a cake-and-beer stand in this location it would do well, because lots of folks travel along in this neighborhood."

The Ward Brothers have issued a challenge stating they are desirous of settling the relative merits of the oarsmen of Great Britain and the United States, and will make a match with any four men for $5000 a mile, to be rowed in the Atlantic ocean. The course to be rowed in either country, on waters mutually agreed upon. The challenges propose to provide the crew willing to visit the United States, for expenses, or will take that amount and row in England.



The lobster fishery is a source of great revenue to Maine. Probably nearly half a million dollars' worth of lobsters are caught on the coast annually. There are numerous "lobster factories" where the canny Yankee hands during the summer is canning lobsters. A lobster factory is not a very attractive institute. It is not a slippery aspect, and the "crackers" at their work, cracking the claws and picking out the meat, have a slightly "fishy" look. Formerly only canned lobsters had better not visit the factory. At least this is the opinion of the Boston Commercial Bulletin, which seems to have been making special investigations about the matter, and which nevertheless asserts that the lobster is good, and a very safe food for the animal to poisoning. The so-called "lady" is simply the carcass of a lobster, from which the most delicate and tempting morsels have been removed. The delicious "tom alley" is the liver, while the unimpressed eggs form the "coral," which is considered a delicacy.

The following indicrous story appears in the Paris Moniteur, and may be a caution to those who are so zealous and unwise as to "improve" the obituaries of this kind: "In a mountain district near Lyons lived a harmless idiot, of Herculean stature, who was commonly known as 'the innocent.' One of these young men told the 'innocent' that a neighbor was dead, and that as every body else did so he must do so too. He at all slight to watch the corpse. He made no objection, and was introduced into a cottage where a man lamenting relatives was seated with a bowl of punch sat round for some time in solemn silence, the idiot behaving with as much propriety as any one else. But one by one the others slipped away, and the 'innocent' was left alone in the death chamber. The intoxicating fumes of the punch began to work, and about, and frighten him out of his poor stock of wits. The conspirators remained within a little while to mock at their victim. But as they neared the door they found, to their surprise, that the howling voice was not of the 'innocent,' but of their comrade, who had agreed to personate the dead man. When they found that the 'innocent' was beating the 'corpse' with a broken fill, and but for timely succor the joke would have been sadly earnest. When he saw them, he threw down the clothes the 'innocent,' instead of being frightened, said coolly, 'Dead man, he still!' and proceeded to belabor him with a force which the joke was utterly incapable of resisting."

MY FAIRY.

From heaven to earth I journeyed at my birth,
Lonesome and wae;
So a kind-hearted fay came with me all the way,
For company.

I brought no wealth, no beauty, love, or health,
And had but store
Of days for property; I think she pitied me,
I was so poor.

Only a throne—though worlds were all her own—
Had this good elf;
So in great charity, finding naught else for me,
She gave herself.

Time best can show how rich the gift will grow—
I took her name;
And now there's nothing known or dreamed I do not own,
And may not claim.

There's none to share—there's every thing to spare!
I am so grand
That I can pay earth-rates with tithes of great estates
In wonder-land.

My ancestry was proud, and fate, maybe,
Will find an heir;
Meanwhile, in my state-robe I travel o'er the globe,
And pay no fare.

My fairy's wand bears me, at her command,
Past afternoon;
Where day with night agrees I greet their majesties,
The sun and moon.

Or isles that are where seas, lonely and far,
Hoard all the sky,
I find; and I forget earth is not heaven yet,
It seems so nigh.

If I am sad my fairy makes me glad Whene'er she will;
She finds all life has lost, she pays all life has cost,
And lulls grief still.

She sings a song sometimes; it is not long—
I know the words;
I think she learned the tune when April, come too soon,
Surprised the birds.

"Great loyalty hath faith, great royalty
Have dreams," she sings;
"Beauty hath wonderment, duty hath dear content,
And hope hath wings."

A REJECTED SAINT.

Sir,—By the terms of our copartnership, formed two years ago, our business relations can be severed by either party giving ten days' notice of dissolution.

I beg to notify you that on and after the tenth day following the date of this present notice I shall insist that all business and social relations between you and me, and between you and my family, shall forever cease.

I shall hereinafter inform you, in very plain and explicit terms, why I have come to the before-mentioned conclusion; but I beg you to understand that I do not thus explain in order to justify myself for the action, for in my opinion any gentleman under the same, or even less offensive circumstances, would have been justified and warranted, morally and—as I believe on my oath as a lawyer—legally too, in expelling you from from his door not only without explanation but with indignity. I write this not only that you may understand how your conduct is viewed by my family and myself, but also that you may perceive by the positive language which I use that this must be the end of the affair, and that I have decided once and for all.

If there is any one thing which will turn the head of a poor young man of illy-balanced mind and unformed character, and make a fool of him, it is a sudden and unexpected behest of valuable property. If there is any other one thing which will turn his head with equal rapidity and make him a knave, it is an artful and designing woman. When the fortune and the woman are combined, as in your case, the youth, as in your case, becomes both fool and knave. (I am fully aware of the libelous character of this language, and stand prepared to prove it truth, and therefore no libel.)

Six years ago you entered my office as a law student. You were a young man without friends or influence; you came to me without a single recommendation; I admitted you to my office without the money consideration usual in such cases, your confident manner and candid language in applying to me—and your very evident ability, clearly demonstrated in your first legal examination—were your only recommendation. In the course of four years you gradually assumed a part of my practice; and in consideration, first, of your great ability, and, secondly, of the fact that you had greatly aided to extend my practice, I voluntarily admitted you, without the money consideration usual in such cases, to a partnership in my business. I held at that time (as at this) the first position professionally in this circuit, and in admitting you to a partnership with me I gave you the half of what is generally considered to be the most lucrative practice in the State.

At the same time, six years ago, you entered my family to become in a great measure a part of it. Socially you were a part of it; and, as such, admitted not only to the best society of the town and the surrounding country, but what is much more in my eyes, into the love and confidence of my wife and myself—a participant in all our pleasures, and, what is a far greater proof in my eyes of our great affection for and confidence in you, a sharer in our grief and a trusted adviser in our troubles. To us both you became very near and dear; you took the place of our own lost boy, and we came to look upon you as a son indeed. [illegible]ow have you repaid this mistaken affection?

You fou[illegible]d when you came to us our young daughter M[illegible]nnie in the first bloom of girlhood, and you at twenty became her constant companion at thirteen. In the course of the six years that have passed you grew from a companion and for more than a year past, and until within the past three months, you were looked upon by all our mutual acquaintances, and by my wife and myself, as our daughter's accepted lover and future husband. You will perhaps argue as a cold-hearted knave would that there was no cause to think thus; perhaps not legally—I admit that in law my case has not a leg to stand on; but there is a higher law, a higher morality in life which you can not afford to offend, and in the eyes of that law you are as guilty as if you had asked me for my daughter and had then treated her in the cruel and unmanly manner of which you have been guilty. The justice which is finally meted out by society to all such offenders against it, will certainly overtake you some day. You will argue coldly, I doubt not, that Minnie had no reason to believe that you loved her and intended to marry her. Not your sworn assurance and promise perhaps; but every action on your part for years past has been taken as such assurance by society. You have monopolized her company in a manner indicative to all acquaintances of an existing engagement between you, and society, until the commencement of the present season, looked forward to the fulfillment of such engagement. That my daughter so hoped and wished, that she in fact loved and loves you devotedly is, I am only too sorry to state, only less certain than that you are a villain, Sir! a villain who has deliberately trifled with her affections!

The intention of discarding her became apparent some months since. It is noteworthy that the first evidences of coldness on your part were almost simultaneous with your good (or evil) fortune in falling heir to a very large property left you by an almost forgotten relation, and the appearance in Longwood society of Miss Millicent Murray of New York city. It was this fortune and this designing woman combined that has developed the fool and knave in you.

In order that there may be no misconception of my meaning I will specify some of the grossest of your offenses.

Millicent Murray is the daughter of my wife's half-sister. She came at the beginning of the present winter to spend the season with my daughter, bringing with her all the latest fashions which her father's rather meagre purse could allow, and a large amount of the small talk which it is her nature to indulge in. She had enough of liveliness of manner and style of appearance to set all Longwood talking of her wit and beauty, though any man of common-sense (no allusion to you, Sir!) could see that she had little of the plain, modest, and sensible manners or the good looks of my Minnie. Older than Minnie, certainly, and therefore with more assurance—perhaps more ease—in her manners, but not more modest, and to a man not already made a fool by his money not more charming than my daughter.

Artful and designing as she was she could conceal from no one but the simple subject of her arts the purpose she had formed to make a conquest of the rich young lawyer—the talented attorney, whose reputation has come to him almost as suddenly as his fortune; and it was not long before it was whispered that the new house you are building was destined, though not originally intended, for her. Most of your friends gave you too much credit for sagacity (not to speak of honesty) to suppose that you could be entrapped by so shallow a woman, but as I have said, fortune has made a fool of you. It only required the arts of a designing woman to complete the metamorphosis; you naturally fell into the snare, and the knavery of your nature was developed. From the first fortnight of her appearance in my house you allowed her to absorb your attention to the neglect of my daughter, to whom you had previously been so assiduously attentive that all her other young male acquaintances had in a great measure discontinued their visits. It was whispered among the young men that you had flirted Minnie. Men avoid "flirted" girls, and the visits of the young men are not yet resumed. Thus far you have wronged her. After a week or two you became the constant attendant of this thorough coquette; and yet you always contrived to have Minnie present at your interviews, a witness of your attentions to her—a captive at your chariot-wheels—a trophy of your first victory, and you persisted in parading her before your new attraction. It is that part of your baseness which makes me most indignant. The fact that you could thus deliberately wound a girl's feelings in the presence of a rival proves you most infamous. That my daughter should never, under these circumstances and insults, show her indignation and disdain, proves conclusively to every man of observation and knowledge of human character that she is of a most lovely disposition—in fact, little less than an angel!

A fortnight before Christmas the invitations of the annual Corporation ball were issued by the Mayor, and among others you and myself were invited. You extended an invitation to Miss Murray, as in courtesy no doubt you were bound to do. I have not the least objections to that; but I do object, and did at the time object, to the matter-of-course way in which you said, after the young lady had reluctantly, though very graciously, decided to do what she was most anxious to do:

"Of course, Minnie, you will go with us."

I was upon the point at the moment of informing you, in the quietest manner that I could in my indignation command, that my daughter would accompany her mother and myself, when I caught her mother's eye. My wife has a very effective eye—a genuine peace-maker—and I refrained, and postponed my rage until I was in a less angry mood. That mood has only come upon me now; at least, this is the first time my wife would consent to my speaking, or rather writing. Minnie, of course, assented.

"I shall hardly have time to get ready, we have so much to do, helping Millicent with her new dress."

Now there was a little saint for you.

And you, like a cur, Sir, you had the impertinence to say that "no doubt Miss Murray would look most lovely." It was then, Sir, that the strength of the appealing eyes of Mrs. Stoddard was most severely tested. I choked my rage and set to thinking.

I had seen the plan you were pursuing from the first, and I had before concluded that the sooner all relation between you and Minnie ceased the better it would be for her. And thinking the ball might be made a convenience in effecting this, I told my wife to inform Minnie that I could not afford to give her a new dress for the ball of this season.

"Minnie," I heard her mother say to her next day, "your papa says he is a little embarrassed in money-matters at present, and that he can not give you a new dress for this ball. I know," she added, and I confess I blushed as she said it, "I know he never says what is not true, or refuses us any thing that he can spare."

And the little saint, after looking considerably discomfited for a moment—as what woman would not?—cheerfully replied:

"Oh, I'm sure, mamma, it isn't necessary at all; my old one will do—and then it isn't absolutely necessary that I should go at all. I shall not particularly enjoy it."

But it was finally concluded that she should go, and that she should wear her ball-dress of last season. Miss Murray ridiculed the idea, not very energetically, however, and it finally resulted in Minnie's dressing in a plain, old-fashioned style, while Miss Murray appeared ready in the parlor arrayed in most gorgeous satin and diamonds. I had hoped that you, on entering the parlor after the completion of their toilets, would object to being seen with a young lady so shabbily attired as my daughter; but you had enough sense left to avoid comment on her appearance, or you saw that, plain as was her attire, she was far superior in beauty to her gaudily-dressed neighbor. When you entered the room you brought two bouquets, one of white and exquisitely-scented flowers, and the other composed of different colors, and evidently inferior to the other in beauty. With a courtly speech of commonplace flattery you handed the white flowers to Miss Murray; and with an offensively intimate, matter-of-course manner, and a very few words, offered the other to Minnie.

She took them with a gentle grace, quietly thanking you, while Millicent overwhelmed you with thanks and praise.

"Minnie," she said, "let me see if I do not like yours best. I suppose I can have which I like best, Mr. Dodge?"

"I dare say Miss Stoddard will not object to give you hers, if you prefer it," you said, as if half offended; "but I think I have chosen the best for you."

Here was an opportunity for Minnie to cut you dead by saying she did not care for either; but she only said in her sweetest manner, and like a little lady that she is:

"The white one will match your dress, Millicent, with its white ornaments, and it is much the prettiest."

"Well, if it is the prettiest, I will keep it," said the unamiable coquette, "and the red roses will do best with your old dress, dear, will they not?"

"Only a year old," said Minnie, smiling, for she saw her mamma was deeply hurt that the fact should be brought so prominently and needlessly before your notice; "and it is almost as good as new."

"Fancy!" cried Millicent; "hear her, Mr. Dodge, she says the dress she wore at the last corporation ball is as good as new."

"Why did you not have a new dress?" you asked, as you had no business to do.

"Papa had other needs for his money this year," said Minnie, "and thought my dress would do."

"Oh nonsense!" cried Millicent, "as if my papa was not always making the same outcry. I tell him I must have money, and I always get what I want."

There was more of this stupid conversation which you remember, and which it is unnecessary to the proper comprehension of this statement that I should give. Suffice that the remainder as well as what I have quoted only serves to reveal the amiability of my daughter, the unamiability of her companion, and your dullness.

You soon left with the two girls, and I followed with Mrs. Stoddard. Of all the aristocracy of Longwood and its neighborhood, assembled in the large dancing-room at the Masonic Hall, not one looked handsomer than Minnie dressed in her last year's dress—which, by-the-by, no one remembered except a few who secretly respected her for wearing it. I was not so indifferent to what was going on as I pretended, but deemed her happiness so precious to me, and my dear child so far above all price, that, if a word could have recalled you from your infatuation for the brazen woman whom you so closely attended, I would not have uttered it.

Naturally Minnie did not attract much attention from the young men present. There were some contemptible fellows who looked upon her appearance in the plain old dress as sure indication of her father's embarrassment. Some avoided her as a "flirted" young woman, but there were others still who believed she was affianced to you, and while they blushed at the manner in which you neglected her, still declined to offer attentions the acceptability of which they doubted.

But while she sat neglected beside her mother and myself you were dancing and flirting with Miss Murray—so persistently, indeed, as to prevent the attentions of other gentlemen. This Presently I saw you and your partner leave the waltz and come up to us, Miss Murray laughing and holding up her beautiful dress and displaying a long rent in it.

Again you spoke in that matter of course way which is to me so offensive when addressed to a lady, that tone as if you addressed Miss Murray's hired companion.

"Miss Stoddard," you said, "Miss Murray needs you. She has torn her dress. Do you mind coming to the cloak-room to mend it?"

Though it was said in the tone which implies that all the world must give way to the speaker, Minnie did not lose her temper, little saint that she is.

"Certainly," she responded, and she rose and took your arm and accompanied you to the cloak-room, and, on her knees, played the seamstress to her rival, while you stood above her and poured your stupid flattery in the ears of the smiling coquette.

A "wall flower" Minnie remained nearly to the end of the evening, but a demure and pleasant one, never once losing her temper. She danced but once. It was with you, I give you credit for that much decency. And when you asked her she quietly accepted, never once showing pique or taking advantage of the opportunity you gave her of showing to the whole company the contempt she ought to feel for you.

I can not stop to enumerate the series of indignities of this character which you have heaped upon her during the month or more since the ball. They we[illegible] gross and oft-repeated offenses, each one of which ought to have long since been resented. But Mrs. Stoddard has in each instance prevented the outbreak which must now ensue. During my absence of the past week these offenses have been renewed, and you have finally capped the climax by insisting that my daughter shall accompany you and Miss Murray to visit your new house—just finished and furnished. Patience has ceased to be a virtue. This last insult is unbearable. Miss Murray could not of course go with you alone, so you asked my daughter to go as a companion to her. When you shall have returned my daughter to this roof expect no more to see her. I give you notice that henceforth and forever you must be a stranger to me and my family.

Henry Stoddard.

Longwood, February 15, 1868.

INDORSEMENT BY MR. DODGE.

"Respectfully returned," as they used to say in the army. My dear old partner should not let his angry passions rise and call ugly names in the manner herein displayed. However, I forgive him and hope he will get over my cruel treatment of his "dear little saint." That is not, however, one of the names to which I have objected. Miss Stoddard is undoubtedly of a very lovely disposition—I suggest to my good friend and reverenced partner that she forms in this regard an admirable example for him, and one worthy of his closest imitation. Not only that Miss Stoddard is a sensible young woman, as will be proven by the accompanying memorandum indorsed hereon, not, I am forced to say, in the most admirable legal style, but certainly couched in terms which I trust will convince Mr. Stoddard that for my cruel and ungenerous conduct, hereby fully admitted and confessed, I was not wholly to blame. Respectfully,

Nathaniel Dodge.

MEMORANDUM BY MISS STODDARD.

Dear Papa,—Do not be angry with Mr. Dodge. There is some excuse for his conduct, though he has nearly broken my poor heart.

This morning he came to me and said, "I have a great favor to ask of you, Minnie. Will you grant it?"

I was, of course, very glad to promise him that I would if I could.

"My new house is finished, and Millicent is very anxious to see it." I know I winced and blushed at this, and he must have seen it, but I said nothing. "And I am anxious that she should examine and be pleased with it. Of course she can not visit it alone, and if you will kindly go—"

I did not interrupt him; he stopped without finishing the sentence, and I was only too glad to promise him, and then escape from the room and hide my feelings.

Mr. Dodge came for us at the time appointed with Cousin Millicent, and we all three bundled into the carriage, and drove to the new house. The house is very beautiful, as you know, and we were a long hour and more examining it. We had gone from parlor to garret, examining all the rooms (except one, which Mr. Dodge kept locked, and which he said he was furnishing according to his own taste, and which no lady had yet seen), when a servant came to say a lunch had been set for us, and we repaired to the dining-room. I was not hungry, and did not at all feel like eating, but Millicent insisted, and as I had come as a sort of duenna, to look after her safety, and preserve her character, I accompanied them to the dining-room.

"Miss Murray," said Mr. Dodge, when we had entered, with a significantly-courtly air, which, I confess, made me nervous, "may I beg you to do me the honor to fill the place of the hostess?"

"Oh, delighted!" she exclaimed, and he seated her at the head of the table.

"She would grace the head of the table nicely, Minnie, would she not?" he said, turning to me.

"Oh! a charming hostess!" I managed to reply; and indeed she did look beautiful, bending over the handsome urn, and pouring us coffee.

When we had finished the lunch I proposed, as there was nothing more to see, that we should return home.

"Oh yes, there is," said Mr. Dodge. "I have something particularly to show you, Minnie, if Miss Murray will excuse you. I fear she might not forgive me if I were to show it to her."

"Oh no," she answered; "I am already dying to know what it is."

"After Minnie," he said; "only one can see it at a time. I am sure she will not misunderstand me, while you, whom I have known so lit-ble, might be offended; but if she thinks it advisable, then you too shall see it."

"And when am I to do in the mean time?"

"Here are the parlors; pray look again at the pictures." And he showed her into the parlors.

"Jenny," he said, turning to the servant who had served lunch, "have you opened the room?"

"Yes, Sir," answered the servant.

"Come, Minnie," he then said to me, offering his arm. "I want to show you the handsomest room in the house."

"The unfinished one?" I asked.

"There is one article only lacking."

"And pray what is that?"

"I hardly know what to call it. I have heard it called by every name imaginable—a sewing-machine" (we had mounted the stairs), "man's counselor, soother, companion, nurse" (he threw open the door of the mysterious room which we had not previously seen, and as he did so he added), "but I want to call it wife."

It was a beautiful sitting-room, with every modern appliance, even to a sewing-machine!

"You see what the room is intended for," he said, when he found I did not answer. "A lady's sitting-room, as you see. I had intended that the first lady that should look into it should be the one who had promised to be its occupant, but I felt anxious to know first if you thought my wife could be happy here."

"That depends—" I answered, trying to keep my countenance and dissemble my feelings.

"On what?"

"Whether or not she loves you and is loved."

"And that of all women know best and can best tell me."

"I"

"Yes, you. She may doubt now that I love her, as I have long fancied she may; but I have hoped against all hope that she loves me. I have long felt I could not do without her, and have tried in every way to discover that her love for me is as strong as that which I bear her. I have every confirmation but the confession, and that I hardly dare—I fear even yet to ask, lest I find that in endeavoring to test her affection I have destroyed it. You did love me once, Minnie."

And as he uttered these unexpected words he took my hand in his, and his right arm was around me. I dared not speak, and only looked up in his face with an expression half of astonishment, half of reproach, for I could not yet believe that this was not a part of the horrible ordeal through which I had been passing.

"This room, Minnie," he resumed at length, "was built for you, and you only. You only have seen it—you only shall occupy it."

"But Millicent?" I managed to stammer.

"Millicent cares nothing for me, and I care nothing for her. She is ever ready to flirt with any one; and seeing that, I have made her understand that I have no intention of carrying out a scheme which my jealous nature suggested to test thoroughly your love and disposition."

"A cruel trick."

"I know it was, my love, but I would never have been satisfied to marry you if I had not thus thoroughly proved to my own satisfaction that you are the sweetest, most amiable, and—shall I say—loving nature in the world!"

I hope, dear reader, you won't think hard of him. I have already forgiven him for his cruelty, which he promises he will never repeat; and if you will look at the object, and are not too bitterly angry at him, I am going soon to occupy the beautiful sitting-room at his house.

CHARLES JAMES FOX AS A GAMBLER.

CHARLES JAMES FOX, the great English orator, enlightened statesman, and reckless man of pleasure, was a most reckless gambler, and spent half his wasted life knee-deep in cards at Brooke's Club. He used to say that the greatest pleasure in existence was winning at hazard, and the next greatest pleasure losing at hazard. Mr. Thackeray says he squandered $1,000,000 at play. Gibbon tells us of Fox once playing for twenty-two hours at a sitting, and losing about $2500 an hour. Talks tall, thin, ascetic Pitt, who liked his bottle of port but despised "the devil's picture-books," Fox had a broad chest, and was a disorderly lion of a man endued with vast physical exertion. The fascinations of chance, and the semi-intellectual character of whist and piquet, had won his heart, and his fidelity to the green cloth was unwavering. At those games, into which he could throw his whole mind, Fox was so pre-eminent that it is said he might, if he had restricted himself to them, and avoided the dealers, have given a sum of $20,000 a year from his card-purse alone. But at hazard he lost hatfuls of money. Of course he won occasionally; once, it is said, $25,000 at a sitting, part of which he instantly paid away to his ravenous creditors. With the money left from these hopeless and jackdaw Fox returned, sat down again at the fatal green cloth, and soon lost his spoils to those from whom he had won it half an hour before. How could such a desperado as cards rule a nation, or oust cold, cautious Mr. Pitt, whose whole life was one icy restless fever of ambition? Yet so stalwart was the Titan of Brookes's that he has been known to play, thoughtless, hour after hour, and then stride off to the House to pour forth one of the most fervid of his generous speeches.

Dr. Johnson's friend, Topham Beauclerk, left Fox one morning after a long night at the gaming-table. Fox was almost mad at his losses; he was miserable, hopeless, and dangerously despondent. Beauclerk, the next day early, went to call on him, feeling alarmed and anxious at the broken spirits; to his surprise he found his lowly friend comfortably stretched on a sofa,

"What would you have me do, my dear Topham?" he said; "I've lost my last shilling."

Had it not been for his privilege as a member of the House, Fox would have been half his life playing at piquet in prison. So thoughtless and good-humored was Fox, that when his brother's house was on fire he offered to bet the noble owner which beam, which chimney, or which partition would first fall to the ground; a magnanimity as great as that of Sheridan, who, when his theatre was burned down, sat down and had his bottle at an adjacent tavern, saying to wonderers: "Mayn't a man take a glass of wine by his own fireside?"

It was to the misdirected affection of his father, Lord Holland (a theorist on education), that Fox owed the first development of his taste for gambling. When only fourteen he went to Spa, where his father allowed the precocious unchecked boy to squander five guineas every night at hazard. On leaving Oxford to make the grand tour he grew still more reckless about money, and ran into debt at Naples alone to the amount of $80,000, which he was only entitled to $20,000 a year at his father's death. The man never shook off the vice that the boy had unhappily acquired. There can be little doubt that Fox's incessant pecuniary difficulties led him into many of those political inconsistencies which Burke and friends lamented, and for which his enemies bitterly reproached him. He was compelled to think of place when he should have thought only of principle. These difficulties, which were his special snare, were chiefly the result of gambling and that indolent neglect which hunted his faculties, and his inheritance, and made his life a wasted one.

We have so many authentic records of Fox's behavior and conversation that we can almost photograph him as he sits at the card-table at Brooke's. "The champion of the people" was heavy and silent till the punch grew low in the bottle. He then woke up to silence the room with the sustained thunder of his Cyclopean laugh. Full of radical sympathies, the thoroughly appreciated the wit of Sheridan and Selwyn; and Sheridan never exerted himself so much as when Fox was present. Fox was spoken highly of Fox's lovable ways; and Rogers, who never praised too much, expresses admiration for his fine taste and kindly feeling, gentlemanlike manner, so full of candor and diffidence, and the ardor and interest with which he always plunged into conversation.

Walpole, walking up St. James's Street in the June of 1781, saw a cart and porters removing furniture from Fox's lodgings. Walpole had a run of luck, and those carrion-crows his creditors had gathered thick round the carcass. Half an hour after this, whom should Walpole find sauntering past the same spot but Fox, who came up and talked to him with perfect sang-froid about the Marriage Bill. At this date Fox's library the first volume of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall" was put up and sold for three guineas. It had been presented by the author to Fox, and the English Demosthenes had written on the flyleaf the following note:

"The author at Brookes's said there was no salvation for the country till six heads of principal persons in the administration were laid on the table. Eleven days later the same gentleman accepted the place of Lord of Trade under those very ministers, and has acted with them ever since."

Lord Tankerville assured the poet that at this Fox once played cards with General Fitzpatrick at Brookes's from ten o'clock at night till six o'clock the next afternoon, a week after standing by to tell them whose deal it was, as the two combatants were too sleepy to know.

Fox once won $40,000; a bond creditor instantly presented himself and demanded payment.

"No," said Fox, "I first discharge my debts of honor."

The creditor remonstrated. Fox then threw the bond into the fire.

"Now," said he, "your debt is a debt of honor," and paid the astonished man.

Fox used very often, after many hours of play, to retain his seat, but lay his head on the table, and instantly fall asleep, exhausted in mind and body.

One night at Brookes's Fox quarreled with Adams, whom he had teased about the baldness of the government powder. Fox refused to stand sideways, saying, "He was as thick one way as the other." Adams fired, and hit his adversary in the groin, but Fox would not return the shot: as they advanced to shake hands Fox said, "Adams, you'd have killed me if it had not been government powder."

RULES FOR GENTLEMEN IN BOARDING-HOUSES.

1. Never use a scraper or door-mat for a boarding-house. This is only necessary in entering private houses. When you pass up and down the halls, or into your own rooms, you are at full liberty to carpetorize tobacco juice; also, you should throw all your clothes in every direction. These things will show that you have a manly indifference to trifles that "women worry about," and is also well to keep the servants busy.

2. Make as much noise as possible in slamming the front-door, stamping through the hall and on the stairs, whistling, etc., especially if sick, and others have retired; and be sure when you take off your boots to dash them on the floor with a bang. This will prove beyond a doubt that you belong to that exalted third class so lastly styled Young America.

3. If an elderly lady or gentleman should occupy the house, refer to them as the "Old Lady," or the "Old Gentleman." Treating the aged with respect will make you a laughing-stock, and can't afford it. Spirited young gentlemen should teach "old fogies" the superiority of youth to age, and the deference due to their opinions.

4. If there are children in the house, express at all times your detestation of them. This will make you popular with the young misses. When the boys of the present generation arrive at manhood we can easily imagine how very unreliable that song will be to their feelings:

"I wish I were a boy again!"

"Do you observe how devotional Deacon Buffet is?" asked a good lady of her husband. "Yes, my dear, the Deacon is very devotional. He always keeps his head bowed in prayer till the contribution-box has passed."

INSTAVATION.—A farmer in New Jersey has astonished all his friends lately by "growing" fat.

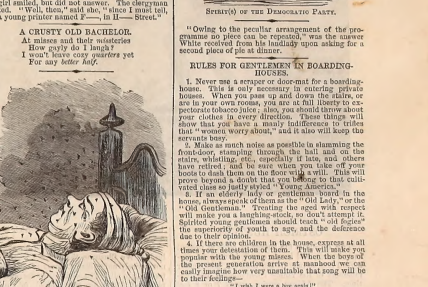
"Why is it, John," asked a lady teacher of one of her primary class in botany, "that the flower of a daisy is always on the top of a stalk looking up?"

"I can't tell," was the decisive answer.



"Next?" said the teacher.

"I don't know," replied the second.

"I guess I've got it," said an urchin at the foot of the class.

"Well, what do you say, Ralph?"

"I think," said the boy, looking down upon the floor, "it's for the same reason that the school-marm's waterfall is always on the top of a stalk looking up—'cause it's the fashion."

OSTRICH HUNTING.

OSTRICH HUNTING.

THE ostrich is the largest of birds at present in existence, and it was excelled in former geological epochs only by the dinornis, and similar members of the family Strathionidæ, now extinct. The African ostrich stands 7 or 8 feet high, weighs from 80 to 100 pounds, steps from 2 to 2½ feet, and strides, when pursued, about 12 feet. The South American ostrich is about 5 feet high, and is not so swift as the African.

Very different are the modes of hunting these birds. We illustrate the African method, one not entirely unfamiliar to most readers, but interesting to all. The ostriches on the open sandy plains of Africa are very difficult of approach, and the Hottentot and other African hunters assume the disguise of a dead ostrich's body, and thus succeed in approaching the birds while feeding on the plains. The South American mode of hunting them is very interesting. General KILPATRICK, our Minister to Chile, lately engaged in an ostrich hunt on the pampas of the Argentine Confederacy. He was assisted by a whole regiment of Argentine cavalry, and accompanied by MR. SAMUEL M. CARPENTER, a correspondent of the New York Herald, who gave a most graphic and entertaining account of the hunt. He states that the chief weapon with which the regiment of hunters was armed is known as the bola, and he thus describes it:

"It is unnecessary to enter into any explanation of the use of the lasso, but the bola is a weapon with which very few are familiar. It consists of three thongs of rawhide, about a yard long, small, strong, and flexible, united at one end, and each having at the other extremity a round stone about the size of a tu-boy's legs, inclosed in a thin rawhide covering. The horseman takes one of these stones in his right hand, whirls up the thong until he can start the bola whirling above his head, and when it has attained sufficient velocity he lets go in a manner that sends the bola revolving horizontally through the air, like a three-spoked wheel, for one hundred yards is not considered too long a distance for a man on horseback to throw at an object, and although the pursued and pursuer may be going at full speed, the bola seldom fails of winding itself round a animal and stopping its flight. As we were close to the hunting ground a large white heron rose from the river bank and crossed the road about fifty yards ahead of our column, flying some thirty feet high. I heard a horse gallop by behind me, something whizzed over our heads, and the bola of one of the servants struck the heron, winding round and round its body and wings, bringing it helpless to the ground. Two things are used also in taking wild horses and cattle: but for such purposes wooden balls instead of stone are used, so as not to injure the animal's limbs. I once seen a wild horse that was frantically galloping for its life around the legs at the first throw of the bola, and after a fruitless attempt to kick loose fall down completely entangled by the thongs.

The hunt was commenced by the party or regiment forming in a semicircle, and moving forward to scour the pampas. We had advanced about a mile, driving before us foxes, hares, and other animals, to which we paid no attention, when I suddenly heard a shot on the left flank, and saw what at first struck me as being a twenty-inch shot with a long handle go through the bushes ahead, right across my front. Away I went, with half a dozen others, in pursuit. The ostrich left us far behind in an instant, and lost sight of him until a few moments later, when we struck the right flank of our semicircle, and was sent back in the centre again. The hunt now became exciting. We soon had a dozen ostriches within our lines, and the bugle was sounded to close in. The extremities, about two miles apart, soon united, and as we closed up, every one had to be on the alert to prevent the ostriches from darting through the interval. At length a great rush was made with revolver, sabre, and bolas; and after half an hour of racing, shouting, and ground-and-lofty tumbling, we succeeded in rallying the party again with ten splendid ostriches captured. Three times the semicircle was formed, and at three o'clock, after having ridden over more than fifty miles, we arrived at camp again with thirty ostrich-skins, several live young ones, and a number of animals picked up on the way home."

SALT-MINES IN LOUISIANA.

A SIDE across a beautiful prairie from New Iberia toward the Gulf of Mexico takes the traveler to the Isle Petite Anse, the plantation of Judge AVERY. It is a beautiful bit of rolling country, rising out of the lagoons and prairies around it like a piece of New England dropped there by mistake. In sugar and cotton its productiveness is very great; as also in the matter of snakes, alligators, and mosquitoes, in which latter it is extremely rich; but its crowning glory —pending the discovery of petroleum, of which there are good signs—is the salt-mines which were discovered at a time when the South, by the destruction of the salt-works along the coast and in Virginia, was almost at a stand-still for want of that article. A negro digging a well struck the deposit, which is a splendid article of rock-salt, perfectly pure and of immense extent. It was placered among the States, the different pits being designated by the names of the States for whose use they were sunk.

Since the close of the war a Northern company has leased the mines for a rent of $20,000 a year, and placed them under the charge of Colonel GREENLEAF, of New Hampshire.

The sketch shows the principal opening and works as they appeared in May, 1866.

DOWN WITH THE DIVERS.

INTEREST has lately been attracted to diving operations generally by the romantic story of the attempts to recover the wreck of the British frigate Hussar, lost with an immense treasure on board, in Long Island Sound during the Revolution of 1779. The history of the wreck is not stranger than the account of the diving apparatus and the experiences of the divers; and as the efforts to recover this treasure have resulted in the invention of a new and improved diving-bell we give an illustration and full account of both story and experiences.

The frigate Hussar was lost on the night of November 25, 1780, while trying to escape the French fleet, which was entering New Narrows, by going through Hell Gate and the Sound out to sea. But she struck on one of the rocks in the Hell Gate passage, which are yet so troublesome to New York commerce, and sunk after sailing a mile further.

The officers and crew were saved, but their effects, and the immense treasure on board (amounting to some 900,000 guineas), and about 80 prisoners (Americans), manacled, were carried down with the ship. The vessel was allowed to remain as she sunk until 1794, in which year the British Government sent over two brigs; but after two years of fruitless labor the attempt to raise the wreck was abandoned for the time. A second attempt was made by the British Government to recover the treasure in 1819, but the American Government interposed, and commanded those laboring in the interest of the English Government to desist, very properly regarding all British vessels then in our waters as prizes of war. At different periods afterward attempts were made to raise the wreck, and secure the moneys, by American wreckers, but all proved futile. At length, in 1848, the "Frigate Hussar Company" formed, and every summer since the vessel is daily visited by the submarine operators. The treasure remains, however, undiscovered; but two of the decks have been removed, twenty-seven of the guns raised, also between 3000 and 4000 of the cannon-balls. Swords belonging to the officers, and a number of guineas—supposed also to be their property—were found in the cabin. Bottles containing liquor have been from time to time taken up. Manacles, with pieces of bone attached, have likewise been obtained. The recovery of these articles, however, has not inured to the pecuniary advantage of the Company, but their recovery has demonstrated beyond question that the exact location of the wreck is known.

While these investigations were progressing, inventors occupied themselves in endeavors to improve apparatus for the purpose of making submarine explorations, and in 1866 Mr. WILLIAM MOORE STORM obtained a patent at Washington for what he calls the "Improved Submarine Explorer." Admiral FARRAGUT indorsed it; WILLIAM W. W. WOOD, a chief engineer of the United States Navy, spoke of it in approving terms, as also Mr. SACKERSDORFF, the engineer of the New York Street Department. This new explorer is 10.6 feet in height, and terminates in a cone, has a diameter of 9 feet, and weighs 32,000 pounds, and gives a space of 204 cubic feet for the three or four men who may be working in it; contains 135 cubic feet of compressed air; has two cylinders, each two feet in diameter for compressed air, which give buoyancy to the bell, and enable the operator to breathe its vitiated contents in conjunction with a water-ballast capacity of 109 cubic feet.

It is with this diving-bell that the experiments are now being made in the manner which we illustrate on page 533. On the occasion of our artist's visit fifteen minutes were occupied in making the descent of 70 feet, and a like time in coming to the surface, after the men had remained on the wreck one hour. They brought up with them a bag of dirt, which, upon being washed through a sieve, yielded some fragments of iron, a few small stones, recognized as what is known to seamen as English shore ballast, and the flint of an old-fashioned musket. The men also reported that they twice struck the wood of the ship, about ten feet from where they went down.

THE MUSTACHE QUESTION.

THE mustache question has been once more mooted at the French bar, and a young advocate was undertaken to prove to the judges who at first refused to hear him because he appeared with this natural ornament—that these exists no formal binding prescription against the display of this badge of manhood by the members of the bar in France. We believe that the question has been settled in England in favor of liberty, but the option has not been often made use of. Even clergymen, when the mustache movement was first set agoing by Charles Dickens, were seen braving prejudice in favor of physiology, and looking, it must be owned, very wolfish shepherds. This reminds us of an anecdote we heard in Germany, of a student in theology who appeared before the examiner, after having waited an unconscionable time for admission, bearded like a pard. The learned examiner fell back astonished, exclaiming, "A theologe with a beard!" "A beard!" cried the student, drawing an air of equal astonishment, and putting his hand up to his face; "bless me, why it must have grown while I have been waiting in the ante-room!"

VEGETABLE PARCHMENT.

As long ago as the year 1841, a civil engineer, William Edward Gaine by name, conceived the idea of manufacturing tracing-paper, and of the employment of any oily matter. Such paper would present certain advantages over the ordinary tracing paper which engineers and others use in preparing maps and plans. In the course of his experiments Mr. Gaine discovered that a powerful acid, called sulphuric acid, has a remarkable action on the surface of paper.

Ten years later, the same gentleman turned his attention to the improvement of paper used for photographic purposes. As every one knows, various salts of silver are employed in photography, and the desideratum was a material the surface of which shall be acted on uniformly by these salts. At the time of making the experiments, sized papers albumanized were commonly used; but the modes of sizing were so various that no uniform result could be obtained. Mr. Gaine, being aware of the peculiar action of sulphuric acid on paper, just spoken of, instituted a series of experiments to determine the action of acids of various strengths on sized and unsized papers; and while so engaged he came across a very singular and unexpected result, in no way connected with photography. He found, that unsized paper—familiarly known as blotting-paper—dipped into sulphuric acid diluted to a certain point with water, emerged from the acid change throughout its whole texture. Blotting-paper which has been thus treated has much the outward appearance of membrane, and has therefore been named vegetable parchment.

In order to insure the uniform preservation of blotting-paper (technically called water-leaf) into vegetable parchment, many precautions are requisite. In the first place, when sulphuric acid and water are mixed together great heat is evolved, through what is called in chemistry the affinity these fluids have for each other. It is important that the mixture should be allowed to cool before the water-leaf is dipped. The large amount of heat generated when the strong sulphuric acid and water are mixed, gave rise to an accident during the early attempts at manufacture. One of the workmen incautiously mixing the water and acid a quantity of steam was given off and spurted out the acid, which came in contact with the face of the operator. The effects might have been serious, but fortunately the man escaped without personal injury. The amount of dilution of the acid is an important matter. If it is too weak the paper is dissolved; if too strong it is charred. The former fact may be curiously illustrated by sprinkling the paper with water. The leaf on being dipped into sulphuric acid of proper strength will be converted into vegetable parchment; but the damp sprinkled part will be dissolved away. A number of careful trials have shown that the sulphuric acid of commerce, of a specific gravity of 1.845, commonly known as oil of vitriol, must be diluted with half its bulk of water in order that the conversion of water-leaf may be attended with success.

One can not fail to be struck with the fact that a body, possessed of such remarkable solvent properties as sulphuric acid, should, at this particular strength, give a material which will bear a great deal of rough usage, and which is scarcely assailable by the strongest chemical agents, such as acids and alkalies. Water has but little effect on it. On wetting vegetable parchment it behaves like animal membrane; that is, it becomes soft and yielding, and on drying it resumes its former condition. It withstands the action of boiling-water, which animal parchment will not. It is used by the inventor and by others as a substitute for animal membrane, and for enveloping fish while boiling. After use it is simply washed, and is ready to be boiled again. Food boiled in this envelope is said to possess more richness and flavor than when treated in the ordinary way.

Another curious fact connected with the material is, that the chemical composition of the paper and of the sulphuric acid remain unchanged; that is to say, the paper gains nothing and loses nothing. Except as a question of expense the whole of the acid used for the conversion could be recovered without loss. The converted paper, if submitted to chemical analysis, is found to be composed of the same elements as it was before the transformation. The explanation of this fact is, that decomposition does not take place on exposure of paper to the action of sulphuric acid; the molecules of matter of which the paper is composed are merely rearranged.

This rearrangement takes place with great rapidity. A piece of blotting-paper passed into the acid is converted, in a few seconds, into a gelatinous gummy mass. This when conveyed into water, in order to get rid of the acid, becomes, within a minute, a tough, elastic, skin-like substance, which, when thoroughly freed from acid, is the vegetable parchment of commerce. Freedom from acid is insured by repeated washings in water and by immersion in a weak solution of ammonia. Any slight trace of acid which the washing might have failed to remove is then converted into sulphate of ammonia, a stable body, the presence of which can by no possibility injure the vegetable parchment.

Great care is taken to remove all the acid, for were any allowed to remain the paper would rapidly lose its texture, and would in time fall to pieces.

The absence of acid has been satisfactorily established by Dr. Hofmann and by other chemists. Dr. Hofmann left the vegetable parchments for hours in contact with moistened vegetable parchment, and they did not exhibit the slightest change of color. He also cut up several square feet of parchment into strips, and boiled them for half a day with water, filtered off the liquid, and concentrated it to a few drops. This liquid was found to contain no acid, and paper moistened with it, and dried at boiling temperature, was no more affected than when treated in the same way with pure water. Hence Dr. Hofmann concludes, and with reason, that vegetable parchment does not carry within it any destructive germ. Time alone can prove the absolute indestructibility of this parchment. Specimens made sixteen years ago are in existence; they are in every respect as perfect as when first produced.

Hitherto the chief purpose to which vegetable parchment has been put is to close vessels in which provisions and other eatables are contained. The advantage it possesses over bladder are, that it is inodorous, and is not liable to encourage fermentation, as, unlike animal membrane, it contains no nitrogen; it is not readily attacked by insects or mice; and it is more elegant in appearance and more economical than bladder.

A very singular use for vegetable parchment, and one previously unknown, was announced in 1861 by Professor Graham. It has long been known that animal membrane, though not porous in permanent certain crystalline bodies but no application of this fact to the purposes of analysis was made until Professor Graham published his great discovery, that crystalline substances in solution may thus be separated from those which will not crystallize. This process is called dialysis. To take a simple example. If soap which is too salt is placed in a bladder and suspended in water, the salt will be removed without impoverishing the soap. This laboratory the knowledge of this fact is invaluable. Thus, in searching for poisons mixed with food and other contents of the stomach, as has to be done in various medico-legal investigations, one of the great difficulties formerly experienced was to separate the poison from the food. Many poisons capable of crystallizing, and these are commonly, can readily be detected. A more agreeable application of Professor Graham's discovery is in the purification of sugar. A French chemist, named Jean Brunfaut, has managed this with great success.

For the purpose of dialysis animal membrane was first used, but Professor Graham found that vegetable parchment possessed the same qualities as regards permeability, and is more readily and cheaply procured. It can also be manufactured of any required size, which animal ment can not. It is doubtful whether dialysis will be found so thoroughly tested and examined but for the existence of vegetable parchment.

In 1865 vegetable parchment was employed in enveloping gun-cotton cartridges used for blasting. The makers of these cartridges are at present sending out thirty thousand a week, and the demand for them is increasing. Very recently it has been found that vegetable parchment is of great value in packaging tea. Tea thus enveloped retains its aroma for an indefinite time; and the vegetable parchment does not communicate any odor or taste to the tea.

All kinds of tea deteriorate in a short time by being packed in the ordinary papers; tea becomes injuriously affected from this cause within twelve hours; and within a week there is a loss of quality of about twenty-five per cent. Tea is very sensitive to odors and flavors; it imbibes the taste of any thing surrounding it. A single drop of squid liquor will flavor a whole package in twelve hours. All kinds of coverings have been resorted to, but none appears so good as vegetable parchment. It will probably come into extensive use for packeting tea.

There are doubtless many other purposes for which vegetable parchment might be employed; but, as is pretty sure to be the case in the introduction of an entirely new raw material, the development of its uses requires time. That it is a most valuable substance there can be no question.

WINIFRED.

SWEET Winifred sits at the cottage door,
The rose and the woodbine shadow it o'er,
And turns to the clear blue summer skies
The clearer blue of her soft young eyes—
Turns to the balmy wind of the south
Her feverish, supplicating mouth,
To ask from Heaven and the sunny glow
The health she lost long, long ago.

The rose on her cheeks is rose too red,
The light in her eyes is lightning sped,
And not the calm and steady ray
Of youth and strength in their opening day;
And the veins that run in the pale and thin,
You can see the blood beneath the skin;
Something hath smitten her to the core,
And she wastes and dwindles evermore.

She thinks, as she sits in the glint o' the sun,
That her race is ended ere well begun,
That between her luminous eyes aside
To one who asks her to be his bride—
Invisible to all but her,
Her friend, her lover, her worshiper;
Who stretches forth his kindly hand,
And tells what her heart can understand.

"Winifred! Winifred! he thou mine,
Many may woo thee, many may pine,
To win from thy lips the sweet caress,
But thou canst not give it, or answer 'yes.'
There is not one amid them all,
Who would not suffer more cruel pain
Than would ever spring from thy disdain.

"Only to me canst thou be given
The bridegroom sent to thee from Heaven;
Come to me! Come! Thy dower shall be
The wealth of Immortality,
Eternal youth, perennial joy,
And love that never shall change or cloy;
All shall be thine the hour we wed,
Sweet Winifred! Be thou mine!" he said.

"Take me!" she answered, with faint low breath,
"I know that well. Thy name is DEATH.
I've looked on thy merciful face too long
To think of thee as a pain or wrong.
I know thou'lt keep thy promise true,
And lead me life's dark portals through.
Up! up! on wings to the starry dome,
Up! up to Heaven! my bridal home."

He laid his hand on her trembling wrist,
Her beautiful, coy, cold lips he kiss'd,
And took her away from sister and brother,
From companion, friend, weeping mother;
From all she loved. With a smile she went,
Of peace and patience and sweet content.
Twas but life's vesture laid in the sod,
Twas life itself to the throne of God!

FLOWER TALK.—A proposal can be made in a choice bouquet, and BURNETT'S delicious perfume, "KALOMAIA," resembles it. Let all beaux remember this.—[Com.]

Shattered Constitutions.

Our constitutions are elastic. They are not easily shattered. In fact, strictly speaking, death alone can shatter them, for they represent the reserve of vitality, which enables the methodical system to react, when the pressure of disease is removed from it. But it is the fashion, when the body is weak, the circulation languid, the nerves tremulous, and the mind depressed, to say that the constitution is ruined, or broken down, or shattered. In cases of the kind described admitter and it will soon be seen how little ground there is for this stereotyped note of alarm. The tonic and alterative properties of the specific, rapidly permeating through the whole organization by the stimulant which forms its basis, will immediately create a favorable reaction, and this reanimating process will go on as the medicine is continued, until strength, health, and mental activity are completely restored. Every day cures of this kind are accomplished. Let the debilitated invalid, when told by his quacking friends that "his constitution is shattered," have recourse at once to this strength-recruiting preparation, in which the finest stomachics and alteratives of the vegetable kingdom are represented, and he will soon be able to meet their gloomy forebodings with a confident smile, and to announce that he has taken a new lease of life under its vitalizing operation.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money to be paid for with the order, or the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

$\frac{20}{100}$ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR FIFTEEN DOLLARS.

$\frac{20}{100}$ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering counterfeit watches, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

Oroide Jewelry.

We are now manufacturing OROIDE JEWELRY, of the latest and most approved styles. No gold jewelry, however high the price, surpasses this in beauty and elegance. In exquisite workmanship, durability, and in every respect, excepting intrinsic value, it equals that of fine gold jewelry, and at less than one inch.

Ladies' Sets of Pins and Ear-rings from $8 50 to $10; Ladies' Sets of Pins, Ear-rings, and Sleeve-Buttons, from $8 to $15; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Sleeve-Buttons, $1 50 to $2 50. Every other kind of jewelry in the same proportion. All orders in sums of less than $5 must be accompanied with a Post-Office Order for the amount (send no money in letters), and this goods will be sent by mail free of expense to the purchaser. Orders for $5 or more will be sent by express, to be paid for on delivery, customers paying express charges.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $25. Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION IN THE UNITED STATES.

By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the different lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

This is one of the great enterprises of the day. The historical matter is really valuable: the sketches of individuals and incidents are admirably drawn, not only by the pen of the historian, but by the pencil of the artist, and both combined will make, when bound, one of the most beautiful histories of this war, if not the great history of the war. There are official documents on every page, at the bottom, which add much to the value of the work. It will be found a store-house of thousands of interesting facts.—Boston Post.

Many of its illustrative pictures are the best that we have seen in such a work; and some of the numerous portraits of prominent actors in the war are admirable as likenesses and works of art.—London Athenæum.

This is as valuable a work as ever was compiled on a historical subject.—Zion's Herald.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and in the size and beauty of its pages and paper, in the profuseness, costliness, elegance, and completeness of its illustrations, far exceeding any other history yet attempted.—New York Observer.

We speak confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. This narrative, embellished by the picturesque illustrations, affords an interesting commentary on the war, and will be of priceless value for preservation.—Boston Advertiser.

The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation.—New York Tribune.

Never has the war's story been better told than it is in these vigorous, truthful, and critically written pages.—Boston Traveller.

THE PLAIN PERIL.

IT is a little more than a month since the Democratic nominations were made. The Convention declared for repudiation, and asserted that the Reconstruction acts were revolutionary and void. It nominated for President a bitter opponent of the war, and of the President a man who held that it was the duty of the Executive to promote union by "trampling into dust the usurpations of Congress." Then adjourned. Its leading members immediately took the stump, and explained the purposes of the party, and the Democratic newspapers every where swelled the chorus. Those who had hoped that time and events would have taught the party caution at least, if not wisdom, found that their only hope of party favor lay in the prompter submission to the party will; and with ridiculous haste they ate their words, sneered at their own arguments, and, by showing that they were contemptibly insincere before, proved that they were only the more contemptible and false now. A month ago the Convention adjourned. Meanwhile the land has rung with the declarations of the party, and the country has seen, and sees, that there is really but a single issue in the election, and that is the renewal of the rebellion. As in 1861, the sole and overwhelming question was, shall the Government surrender to the rebellion, so now all other interests necessarily disappear in the fundamental inquiry whether the rebellion shall regain at the polls what it lost in the field.

MR. SEYMOUR and his supporters struggle in vain to hide the issue. His current and his paper attempt to make the financial question paramount, and to frighten and disgust the country by the grossest misrepresentation of the expenses of the Government, and by mystifying corruption. The public expenses, no one denies, are large, and the Democratic party, from which the rebellion and its support proceeded, is responsible for the burden. The Administration is, at some points, tainted with corruption—a fault likely to be corrected by intrusting it to the party of FLOYD, CODE, the New York municipality, and the Tammany ring. But the question, although not ostensibly of the highest importance, is, in the nature of things, secondary to the reconstruction of the Union. So long as the integrity of the nation is in debate, so long as the problem is, whether the friends or the enemies of the Union shall control the Government, all economical questions within the Union are inevitably postponed. The public burden can be lightened—that is, taxation can be diminished—only as the wealth of the country increases. Wealth increases only by production, and by industry and enterprise are essential to production. But confidence is the cardinal condition of steady industry; and until confidence is established there will be neither a movement of capital into the disordered States, nor continuous and sufficient labor. The Republican party has taken the great, primary step toward the pacification upon which peace and consequent confidence depend. The Democratic party proposes to undo every thing that has been done; to regenerate the hostility of race, and to give, by force, the disordered States into the hands of those who hate the Union, and burn with the desire of revenge.

The Democratic policy is necessarily one of civil war. It does not propose a peaceful solution of any difficulty. And that this is distinctly understood is evident. Just before the Democratic Convention assembled MR. C. C. LANGDON, a delegate from Alabama, wrote, with an unknown knowledge of his party's "The Democratic doctrine is, that the reconstruction measures of the present Congress, and every thing done under them, are unconstitutional, and, of course, absolutely null and void. This declaration, I take it, will constitute the plain plank in the Democratic platform, and whoever is nominated must pledge himself to stand by it and enforce it. That the Supreme Court will eventually (probably at its next term) decide all these acts to be unconstitutional in every substantial respect, I believe as firmly as I believe that the sun will rise to-morrow. Then we were in a President whose views are in accord with that decision, and who has the nerve and the will to do his duty. It will be his duty to enforce the decree of the Court, if need be, at the point of the bayonet."

But the party was riper for a more decided, if revolutionary and anarchical policy. MR. LANGDON proposed that the President should act in deference to a judgment of the Supreme Court overruling the reconstruction acts. But General FRANK BLAIR went further. He would not wait for any judicial decision. Let the election itself decide, cried he. Let it be understood that the question which we submit at the election is whether the new State governments shall be overthrown by force, and the election of the Democratic candidates will be the President's warrant. "There is but one way," wrote General BLAIR, and for saying so he was nominated—"there is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives."

THIS is the acknowledged and accepted policy of the party. That portion which, just before the nomination of General BLAIR upon this declaration, admitted that the new State governments had been recognized by Congress, and that consequently, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, there was no other lawful mode of overthrowing them than that provided by their constitutions, now assert that the election will decide whether those governments are to stand or to be overthrown, as General BLAIR says, by force. Indeed, if there is any art, it can only be by force; for it is not conceivable that, in several of the States, half the inhabitants will disfranchise themselves for the benefit of those who avow their hostility to them. By the words of the candidate for Vice-President, and by the eager assent of the delegates to the Convention, and of the leaders and papers of the party, as well as from its character and antecedents, the issue presented is simply that of a renewed civil war by the late leaders and supporters of the rebellion.

The plain steps to this result we consider in another article.

THE WAY TO WAR.

HOW a Democratic success at the election would occasion civil war is easily seen. General BLAIR does not hesitate to say that the Congress must be wholly disregarded. The Supreme Court must not be invoked. The President must usurp all powers of the Government and act alone. He must be a CÆSAR. "Because," says General BLAIR in his letter, "if the President elected by the Democracy enforces, or permits others to enforce, the unconstitutional acts, the Radicals, by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives, will control both branches of Congress, and his administration will be as powerless as the present one of MR. JOHNSON." Force is, therefore, the only alternative.

IF MR. SEYMOUR be elected, after this loud and reiterated declaration by his party that his election will mean forcible overthrow of the present State governments in the Southern States, the virtual repeal of the Reconstruction acts by declare those Governments void. He would then be impeached and probably convicted. But the Democratic party, victorious at the polls, with the whole rebel force jubilant and ready, would dispute the sentence, and rise against its execution. Meanwhile in the Southern States, the new Democratic State organizations summoned by the President would be formed. They would dispute the State authority with the present incumbents. The President would recognize the new claimants and order the army to their support, and to "trample in the dust" the others. They in turn would appeal to Congress, and be engaged in conflict with the President. Meanwhile the Representatives and Senators sent from the new State organizations would arrive in Washington, and of course with the other Democratic members would be recognized as Congress by the President. But, indeed, long before this event civil war, by ravaging the country, and WADE HAMPTON, and FORREST, and DICK TAYLOR, and HOWELL COBB, and the old rebel chiefs who say with ALBERT PIKE, "We do not love and will not pretend to love the Union, though we have agreed to obey the laws of the conqueror," would gladly behold in a desolating war and a ruined republic the fullness of their revenge.

THIS is the real issue. It can not be denied, for the Democratic party exultingly declares it. It can not be revoked, for the experience of the last few years has taught us that we have as desperate and dangerous elements as any country at any time. It is the relapse of the rebellion, and a relapse of disease often proves the fatal or original attack. The reason why a movement when the utmost effort of every faithful citizen was made to overthrow it than now to the salvation of the country. On the contrary, as General GRANT, with his moderation, his firmness, his tried patriotism, his singular sagacity, his signal illustration of the highest genius and his intelligent American; and with him SCHUYLER COLFAX, who has never said a word or done an act that can inspire the least distrust, and who is in full accord with the best and most peaceful and progressive tendencies of the country. They are the candidates of those who would do the best that the circumstances allow; who would reconstruct the Union upon equal rights, who would neither ostracize nor revenge, who would not exasperate the jealousies of race, but who would neither betray the tried friends nor the pledged faith of the country. They are the candidates of the great body of citizens of proved patriotism, intelligence, honesty, and of a peaceful mind obedient to law. On the other hand is MR. SEYMOUR, a plausible politician, for whose success the rebels in arms prayed four years ago; who preferred that the Union should perish rather than slavery, and who declared the success of the Government to be as revolutionary as that of the rebellion. With him is General BLAIR, whose remedy for the situation is the naked sword. They are the candidates of all who hate the Union and who sought and seek its dishonor; of those who thought the war a crime, and demanded that the Government should yield to the rebellion; of those who would break the public word to the public creditor; of those who would put the late slave, always loyal, under the feet of his always rebel master; the candidates of the ignorant and lawless every where in the land.

Let every man be alert. There is no doubt of the issue or of the candidates. And when once they are understood there is no doubt of the country and of the result.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

THERE is great unanimity in the expression of the public judgment of the character of MR. STEVENS. Even the Democratic journals recognize his sincerity and independence; while the Republican, praising his love of liberty, concede his lack of many essential qualities of a true statesman and leader of men. There is a universal feeling that even had he been a much younger man he had performed the chief service that the time in which he lived and his peculiar powers allowed. MR. STEVENS was especially fitted for stormy times that mainly require simple and honest thought and indomitable will. He had, in a great and unusual degree, insight than is allowed him by many critics, who are irritated because of his total want of perception and disregard of knowledge in certain other directions. His courage, his contempt for the arts of rhetoric, and the satisfaction of a vigorous and proudly self-reliant nature in the shock of conflict, his keen and exaggerated statement, diminished his direct and available influence. Consequently he was often a leader without followers, a ruler without subjects. His friends rejoiced when for the sake of the cause; and he had a kind of surly delight in the support of his enemies, who hoped to ruin it.

But while his plans often failed as the time and in the manner which he presented them, his wisdom was often vindicated by the event. Take, for instance, his action in regard to the President, and upon the general subject of Reconstruction. When he came into the Thirty-ninth Congress, on the 4th of December, 1865, he threw down the gauntlet to the President which he took up by his motion for the Reconstruction Committee. It was considered by many Republicans a very premature and impolitic measure. They doubted whether the party could afford to break with the President, and they were not at all sure that it ought to. The situation was very confused and difficult. The war was over, and in fact, there were no provisions in law. Delight at the end of the war, and the wary silence of the Southern leaders, which was misinterpreted as acquiescence in the result, the feeble fairness of giving the Johnsonian scheme a sufficient trial, the natural reaction of feeling, all seemed to make any positive radical difference with the President very unwise. But these were the very reasons that persuaded MR. STEVENS of the necessity of the plan he proposed. It was because the President, in their unwillingness or want of comprehension of the true position, while he had a very definite theory of action, that MR. STEVENS perceived the importance of forcing equally definite action upon the part of Congress. A policy, in the unsettled state of opinion, there could not be; but the determination to have a policy should prevail which Congress did not approve or itself a perfectly definite action. It gained time, and time was the vital necessity. The Senate, as MR. FESSENDEN said in the last days of the session, was not to adopt the convictions of the President without examination. The Committee was appointed. From that moment the contest between the President and Congress was relentless. But it is upon the principles of reconstruction which that Committee announced that the war will be waged, and the Union restored.

So with MR. STEVENS's territorial theory. His announcement startled those who held to the celebrated Johnsonian logic, that as the war was for the purpose of preventing a dismemberment of the Union, and was successful, the Union was not dissolved and the States were as they were before. But statesmanship and the conduct of human affairs in general is not a matter of theory, but of experience and common-sense. The President and his friends howled with horror at MR. STEVENS as a rebel and disunionist; and swore that they clung to the views of MR. LINCOLN. Now MR. LINCOLN's views were that the inquiry whether the States were in or out of the Union was a pernicious abstraction; while the real question was how to restore them to their practical relations in it—a subject of which Congress was the judge. This illustrates the great importance of the method of "putting things." It is not very easy to detect the essential difference between the power of Congress to determine how disorganized States shall resume their relations in the Union, and its power to determine how Territories shall become States of the Union. Yet the difference between them is all the difference between MR. LINCOLN and MR. STEVENS. MR. STEVENS stated the case with a rough and startling picturesqueness of phrase—MR. LINCOLN with sagacious moderation. But the view of MR. STEVENS is substantially that of the Reconstruction measures.

But neither the method nor the corollaries urged by him were adopted. Congress proceeded with great and wise deliberation, as we have heretofore indicated; and the best opinion of the country has always rejected the plans of confederated whims that were the work of MR. STEVENS. It is just here, indeed, in practical and specific measures of legislation, that his want of wisdom and of knowledge were apparent. He really seemed capable of proposing that Congress should enact that under certain circumstances twice two should make five. But the good sense of his fellow-members usually prevented his mere whims from becoming laws, while the great value of his real service was never overlooked. As, however, we are now reaching an epoch in which special experience and particular knowledge are more than usually indispensable in legislation, MR. STEVENS was plainly ceasing to be the conspicuous figure that he had recently been. Yet to the last his extraordinary vitality did not forsake him. Although an old man—for he was seventy-six—there was no painful, palpable decay of his powers. He died at a moment when the public feeling was softened toward him, and he will be always remembered, among the noted men of his generation in the country, for his indomitable fidelity to his conviction of equal rights and his intrepid self-assertion.

CHOOSING ELECTORS IN ALABAMA.

THERE is no doubt that it is the intention of the Democratic leaders in the Southern States to organize a terrorism by which to prevent the voting of the new citizens, and to give the vote of the late rebel States to SEYMOUR and BLAIR. WADE HAMPTON and HOWELL COBB openly urge the coercion of the colored voters, and the social and commercial ostracism of the loyal white voters. The Democratic party, the resolution of a Democratic Club in Columbia, South Carolina, that no member shall employ any freedman who can not show a Democratic pass; and ALBERT PIKE, President of the Club in Memphis, informs colored voters that they can procure from him "cards that can not be counterfeited," covering their contracts for employment by "Conservatives," and urging all Democrats to refuse to employ those who can not show such cards. If we remember that the white population in the rebel States have carefully prevented, as far as they could, the sale of land to the freedmen; that the latter are therefore almost wholly dependent upon their white employers; that their gross ignorance, and their total inexperience to color, and the thriftless habits, which slavery engendered, we can imagine what the result of an organized system of social coercion must be. It can hardly fail to affect the election in a very serious manner.

The calculation of WADE HAMPTON and his associates evidently is, that with the aid of the Ku Klux Klan, the seventy votes of the Southern States can all be secured for SEYMOUR and BLAIR. The cry of "military despotism," and the objection to the invalidity of elections held under military supervision, meant only that Democratic terrorism was impossible unless the soldiers were removed. "Take away the soldiers, and we will take care of the negroes," suggestively said MR. ALBERT PIKE, MR. JOHN FORSYTH, and the rest of the most virulent rebels. And a man must adopt a very curious view of human nature who supposes that without the utmost careful consideration of the facts of the case, and measures taken accordingly, there can be a tolerably fair election in the Southern States. It was with this conviction that the proposition was made in the Alabama Legislature that the Presidential electors should be chosen by the Legislature. This is a strictly constitutional method of appointment in that State. It has elicited a loud and angry shout from the party who base all their hope on Democratic negroes, and who propose to keep all others both from work and from the polls; but it is a matter of very serious consideration whether the Legislature does not more truly represent the opinion of the people of Alabama than electors chosen under the system of terror and coercion organized by WADE HAMPTON and the Democratic leaders.

GOVERNOR SMITH, in his veto message to the Legislature, says that his judgment in the proposition "denies the very principles" of the Republican party. But the Governor should reflect that while in a normal situation such a system of choosing electors is not desirable, the reason is that then a general election reveals the true general opinion. But is that likely to be the case in Alabama under the circumstances? The Republican party may be in a majority in the State, and yet, as a large part of it is composed of the new citizens, it is evident that the open and violent threats made, and the vigorous organization of unscrupulous men, may prevent that party from carrying the State? Would it then be a denial of the true principle of republican government to secure the expression of the will of the majority in another equally constitutional manner? The Governor says that the proposition implies that the colored men are not to be trusted. We do not see it so. No one doubts their fidelity to their principles, and their sympathy with the party of equal rights; but one may fairly doubt whether they can all be counted upon to assert that fidelity, by voting against the open threats of HAMPTON, PIKE, the Ku Klux Klan, and the Democratic clubs. The Governor also says that the bill denies the right of every citizen, white or black, to indicate his choice for President. That is to say, that if the bill is not passed that right will be protected. Very well: no one can ask more. The loyal country has the right to understand, from the Governor's veto, that he is unwilling to approve or secure a fair an election as that by which the Constitution of the State was adopted. That seems to us to refute all justify his veto.

BUILDING IN NEW YORK.

THE time within which buildings may be commenced in the city proper next Spring is rapidly passing away, and yet many who would otherwise make immediate arrangements for the purpose are deterred from doing so by the spike of bricklayers, who claim four dollars and a half per day for a day of eight hours. A large number of eligible lots yet remain unimproved; but the fact that they will be occupied about eight hundred acres of land, and that numerous boulevards have projected of greater width than the ordinary streets and avenues—thereby diminishing the area on the Island which may be devoted to buildings—forces upon our attention the question, what is the true solution of the difficulty before us, resulting from a constantly diminishing area and a constantly increasing population. The relief which inevitably flows from Kings County, Westchester, New Jersey, and Staten Island need not in this connection be considered.

The ordinary size of lots is 25 feet front by 100 feet deep, and on this basis the blocks, as laid out by the Commissioners, say above Forty-seventh Street, have been constructed, so that their depths is not capable of being much changed. The front of each, however, may be enlarged or diminished at the pleasure of the owners. The value now attached to lots 25 by 100, in good localities, and the cost of putting up a first-class house covering the whole front, extending from say $25,000 to very large figures, depending on the scale with which it is adorned—render it impossible that any but the most favored in financial position can occupy such houses in this city, even those of the minimum cost. The sum required to furnish, added to the cost of lots and buildings, make up to a considerable fortune thus invested; but the constantly augmenting taxation, and the increased expenses of living, constitute the chief causes for limiting the number who may enjoy life on this princely scale. Hence the number who are driven to boarding-houses and hotels, and the great interest which is manifested in the question how this last expedient may be avoided by those in moderately good circumstances.

The resort to the French style of building and living is presented by many as the true solution of the difficulty—houses extending the whole depth of a block and covering several lots, to be constructed so that families may live on separate floors at a rent of greater economy than would be possible in such houses. But there is a serious objection to this plan in the fact that a single family is crowded in the by any occupant; but if he aspire to the position of owner it must be limited to a share in the whole property, if less than the whole. His interest—say a third—would thus be subjected to contingencies not agreeable in the case of a fixed residence, arising from a joint ownership in the change of shareholders might often occur, owing to the vicissitudes of sending business and life itself. In case of fire a majority of joint owners might demand some use of the property not favorable to the interests of all, and, if disposed, might seriously embarrass the minority of interests with a view to the acquisition of the whole property. The true relation to be borne by the occupant to the owner of such a building should be that of landlord and tenant, as its occupancy by several joint owners is scarcely feasible. Persons intending to build for their own use this plan will be generally be rejected, and another resorted to which possesses greater advantages. We refer to narrow houses.

The owner of a single lot of 25 feet front may divide it into two of 12½ feet; two lots may be divided into three of 8⅓ feet. Three lots we cut up into five lots of 15 feet each. The division which is most economical is that which forms the lots into the dimensions of 12½ feet by 100, the houses on them to be built with party-walls, and to have such depth—about 60 feet is best—as to make room for an easy staircase between the front and rear walls of rooms. If of little depth, the ceilings may be of 9 feet, and so to be, so as to admit of a proper staircase, occupying about one-fourth the depth. These houses may be of three or four or five stories, as may be required by the number composing the family. Their interior decoration will, of course, depend on the means of the owner. The whole width between the exterior side walls should be devoted to the entrance, which would thus be large, terminating at the staircase and a more diminutive hall, which latter extends to what is usually a dining-room. Generally these are basement-houses, having a kitchen below the floor which has been described, with a cellar under that, and as many drawers as are convenient. Where the ground is already excavated, as is frequently the case, it might be expedient to extend the under-cellar the whole depth of the lot, instead of going to the expense of filling up the yard with earth, and have also a kitchen with a deck roof where the yard ordinarily is, for summer use. The deck-roof could be used for all the purposes to which a yard is ordinarily applied.

In constructing these houses, if the three portions—front, middle devoted to stairs, and rear—were separated from each other by transverse walls, and the front and rear walls were made double, on the plan now most uncommon, the building would be substantially fire-proof, if the main timbers extended fore and aft, resting on those walls, instead of being inserted in the side 12-inch walls, in which case their buts are only four inches apart if the sidewalls are party-walls. If the quality of being much fire-proof were a desirable advantage, this can be accomplished more fully in the construction of the staircase, which has the advantage of being within four brick walls, and may be made partly of iron.

The feature the most objectionable in all houses, on the score of exposure to fire, is that of lath and plaster, the latter extending from floor to floor, in the front and rear, and in the parts of modern buildings. It is objectionable because a draught is furnished from cellar to garret, inside of the walls, which renders it careful than is the draught in most chimneys, and so grounded that the water from engines can not reach the fire through these screens. Brick walls would not only cut off this draught, but make it difficult if not impossible to have any fire extend to a floor above the one which might be burning. The draught from imperfect vicular walls of lath and plaster is extended between all the floor and ceiling beams, so that a perfect chimney is every where found, except when brick walls are used, and these are objectionable. It is usual to have two windows front and rear to such edifices, but only one may be preferred, which would leave room for the front door to have the double character of door and window imparted to it. No trouble in fastening up would be given, and by a little attention the entrance would be rendered almost without the violence of a burglar, and indeed of others.

The best houses of this class which have been constructed have quite an appearance of elegance outside and in, and are equivalent in this respect to those of 20 feet front, which have seven and a half feet devoted to halls extending from front to rear. Any one who visits them so small as to be unsuitable for habitation have been surprised at the advantages on the score of appearance and comfort which they present.

A family inhabiting one of these structures may enjoy on separate floors the amount of room which the world accupy in a French building on a single flat, with the inestimable advantage in the former case that full and complete ownership may accompany its possession.

The question whether or not this shall be done in this expensive city, oppressed with the most disgraceful taxation, is not one of choice but of necessity to the great bulk of substantial citizens; and the sooner they enter on this plan and construct houses upon it the better. Space is gained by having party-walls on each side, and if used as dwellings it is economical. Its beneficial. A half dozen houses built on each of two contiguous streets would render the whole improvement so safe on the score of fire that the tax of insurance would be unnecessary, or submitted to only on a moderate scale, and some general plan of heating by a single apparatus might in that case be employed; but if our capitalists will construct houses such as we have described, or if individuals will unite on this plan there will be a great demand for them by tenants who desire to own property; and the scheme will go far toward solving the question how a growing population may be accommodated on the area which constitutes the island of New York.

A LITTLE LATE.

THE Democratic managers, justly alarmed by the plain statement of their policy which has been made by the delegates to the Convention and the leading organ of the party, have called leaders not to speak o distinctly, and WADE HAMPTON is now trying to cou gently. It is a little too late.

When MR. HAMPTON returned m the Convention he spoke of its action to his nstituents. He had been a member of the most important Committee, that upon resolutions. The two important points of the platform were repudiation and the denunciation of the reconstruction measures. The first of these was put into the platform by the friends of MR. PENDLETON, the second by WADE HAMPTON. Here are his own words:

"I said I would take the resolutions it they would allow me to add but three words, which you will find embodied in the platform. I added this: 'And we unconstitutional, and void; When I proposed that, every single member of the Committee—and the warmest friends of the Union in the North—came forward and said they would carry it into the end."

General HAMPTON then proceeds to state that if the Democrats are successful in the election the present State organizations will fall. How? They can fall only by the repeal of the Reconstruction acts, or by the sword. But whoever may be elected President the Senate will remain unchanged. The acts can not, therefore, be repealed. Yet his Democratic allies assured General HAMPTON that they would "carry out to the end" the declaration that the acts were revolutionary and void; and they nominated by acclamation a candidate for Vice-President who declared it to be the duty of the President, despite the Senate and House of Representatives, to overthrow the present organizations by the sword.

Are General HAMPTON and his fellow-Democratic managers so inconceivably foolish as to suppose that the people of the United States do not understand plain words? The phrase "carry it to the end" has had, and was meant to have, but one significance. It means overthrow by force. The Charleston Mercury says that it has been urged by Northern Democrats to advise the Southern speakers not to say too much. It is, we say, a little late to close the stable-door carefully when the noble steed is kicking up his heels on a plain sight. Before the Convention met the same Mercury said that it presumed the position taken by the Convention, and "the true principle for the Democratic party to adopt is that the Reconstruction laws are unconstitutional, and to be wiped out,.....that Congress has no jurisdiction in the case."

Whether, therefore, General HAMPTON and the illustrious patriots COBB, SEMMES, TOOMBS, RAMSEY, and others, speak or are silent, whether they plead their own remarks and General BLAIR's letter are to be taken in a purely Pickwickian sense or not, the feelings, the views, and the purposes of the Democratic party are equally manifest. A distinguished Maine Democrat, the Hon. GEORGE M. WESTON, who, two years ago, was the Democratic candidate for Congress in the Bath district of that State, perceives the inevitable tendency of the party and does not hesitate publicly to withdraw his support from it. MR. WESTON says that "the seas unredeemed mischief in MR. BLAIR's policy. The flag with which he marches at the head of the Democratic column is the black flag of disunion and war for the cause, country, and a war of races for the South. The minds of his misguided followers are honest and well-intentioned, but it is none the less true that he is leading them in a broad and straight road to ruin."

EX-REBELS AND REBELS.

JOSIAH G. ABBOTT remarked, that it was hardly becoming in ex-rebels, like himself, who welcomed such a secessionist as JOSEPH E. BROWN to their Chicago Convention, to cry out against WADE HAMPTON, COBB, TOOMBS, SEMMES, and others of the same kind.

There are two kinds of ex-rebels, those who concede that "the lost cause" is lost, and who act accordingly, and those who insist that it is not lost, and who act accordingly. The first are not a very large number; but they are very heartily supported by all loyal men. The last are undoubtedly a majority of the late rebels, and they are naturally allied with the Democratic party. The Republicans harmonize with Governor BROWN, of the General Locofocism and Governor ORR, not merely because they support the party, but because they prove by their acts that they have abandoned the cause of the rebellion, and they warn the country against WADE HAMPTON and his associates, because they frankly and openly declare their devotion to that cause, and their faith in its ultimate triumph.

Thus WADE HAMPTON, at the Commencement exercises of General LEE's College in Virginia, said, at the end of June, upon his way to the Democratic Convention, "The cause for which JACKSON [STONEWALL] and STUART fell can not be lost, and in some form will yet triumph," and ended his speech by proposing "The lost cause." Again in Charleston, after the Convention, he said: "Never half I admit that the cause itself failed, and that the principles which ga·e it life were therefore wrong." What the other Southern Democratic leaders say we also present. Governor ORR said, at about the same time: "It would have been wise for the white people to accept the Reconstruction Acts.....If the Southern Governments in 1869 are declared void the States will be left in a condition of anarchy."

Now, Governor ORR was as much a rebel as WADE HAMPTON, and Governor J. GOLDEN ADAMS unable to see that a loyal Union man may very consistently sympathize with the one and "cry out" against the other?

THE MILITARY DESPOTS.

IN a late speech in KANSAS General BLAIR said that the "secret of the adherence of General GRANT, SHERIDAN, and other regular officers to the Radical party is the tendency of that party.....toward military despotism." We have elsewhere considered General GRANT as a military despot. But the ferocious THOMAS, the liberty-crushing SHERMAN, the tyrannical FAHNESTOCK, the cruel SHERIDAN, are also all well known to the country. Their constant efforts to erect a military despotism upon the ruins of the republic are familiar; and not less notorious is the disobedience to law and order of those Conservative supporters of SEYMOUR and BLAIR—Generals FORREST, HAMPTON, BEAUREGARD, WISE, TOOMBS, and Admiral SEMMES.

But one of the most alarming indications of the tendency toward a military despotism on the part of General GRANT and his friends is the speech of General MEADE upon resigning his functions as Military Governor of Georgia. At the dinner in honor of the installation of the new civil government that artful and designing man, that deeply, that remorseless satrap, said:

"In speaking on my own behalf and that of every officer present, I am sure I can say that it is with the greatest satisfaction and pleasure we yield to the civil authorities that power which under the law it has, until this day, been our duty to exercise.

"No one in this whole land is more relieved at the restoration of civil authority; no one regrets more the temporary relief for a time required it should be subordinate to the military; no one will more promptly and cheerfully support again the civil power than I do. The military paramount to the civil power that was the humble individual who now addresses you. And I feel confident, gentlemen, as we relinquish it we believed country, and that we make no rash step in praying for the prosperity and success of the administration of the Governor, his cabinet, and legislature, in asking God's blessing on him and his efforts to restore peace and order to the affairs of the State with energy, prudence, and moderation, that peace and prosperity may reign throughout the land, and the people of Georgia be restored to the beneficent sway of civil laws. And I trust that it will be in my power soon to be back among you to enjoy the blessings which follow a good government; to forget the wrongs of the past, and that they ever were under military rule."

If this doesn't show a tendency upon the part of the military officers to establish a military despotism, the country will have to take General BLAIR's word for it. It will be remembered that the government upon which General MEADE and his fellow-officers look as one of those organizations which General BLAIR—who fears a military despotism—hopes will be overthrown by the army, and trampled into dust.

We trust that General BLAIR will continue to write letters and to make speeches, and that he and his friends, SEMMES and FORREST and HAMPTON and the rest, should happen to find the latter in Kansas, for he would be a most ardent SEYMOUR and BLAIR man—will not hesitate constantly to warn the country against the dangers of military rule—against Generals GRANT, SHERMAN, MEADE, THOMAS, FARRAGUT, and SHERIDAN.

DEMOCRATIC PORTRAIT OF GRANT.

THE following allusion to General GRANT in the New York World, written before the dire exigencies of party compelled it to eat its own words, is a biting sarcasm upon HORATIO SEYMOUR and certain of his supporters:

"When the man of men look upon each a character they may learn a lesson of respect for themselves and each other; they are taught by it that high qualities and great abilities are consistent with the simplicity of taste, contempt for parade and plainness of manners and habits. They see that a man may be a hero without natural sympathy.....The career is a lesson in practical democracy. It is a quiet satire on the ostentatious, the puppyism, and the shallow affectation of our fashionable society. It is a rebuke to the swagger of our plausible, glib-tongued demagogues."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Western outlaws and express robbers are becoming so numerous and bold as to threaten to organize them as a terrible rate. On August 7 a posse of constables of Crawford, Illinois, attempted the arrest of the desperadoes. They fired on the constables, killing one. The remainder and a much of citizens then rushed upon the robbers, and killed them all.

Several new governors of Southern States recently made requisitions on the Secretary of War for arms under a law of 1794, but the Secretary has declined to furnish until further legislation is had on the subject. Some requisitions, however, have acted in an appeal to Congress to meet on the day of election, and if they will not take action at once, will do so.

A new city government was inaugurated in Montgomery, Alabama, on the 18th inst., without the offices being colored men, and the police force being half colored.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Pope's foreign soldiers do not like his service, and are deserting in large numbers.

Abyssinia is actively organizing her army, and the Hungarian forces are being armed and equipped. The latest revolutionary movement in Spain is that the Prussian General von Moltke, revealing the fact that Prussia aimed at the dismemberment of Austria, and by "made use" of Italy—has fired anew the martial spirit. The Austrians are frightened at the revelation, and the indignant at being represented in the right of a cat's paw; and Prussia is delighted at the mistake of Prussia in thus uselessly making two enemies.

There are fearful reports from Japan. Several great battles have been fought; half of Jeddo has been destroyed; all native Christians have been condemned to death by the Mikado, and many executions have taken place. Another report comes from Nagasaki to the effect that the Christians had been taken in a compact to rise and drive out the Protestant missionaries.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

"I HAVE no history," said THADDEUS STEVENS to a visitor a short time before his death. "My life-long regret is that I have lived so long and so uselessly."

Mr. STEVENS was one of those men whose great success in life was imperceptible. There are no great salient points in his history, no single achievement of vast importance to the country and glory to himself, to point to in his honor; and yet the labor he performed, the good he accomplished, in private and in public life, was so great and signal that in dying we recognize that he leaves a void not easily filled. When it was told that he was dead, all men began to recognize and admit that he was one of those characters who make and lead public opinion, and that it was a guide whom the country had lost in him. The positive men are not so plentiful in American politics that one of the most independent and determined of them can die and the loss be unfelt.

Mr. STEVENS was one of the most positive characters this country has had in politics for many years, and the wide-spread influence which he wielded was due to that peculiarity of his character rather than to any statesman-like quality of mind, superior culture, or oratorical power. His earnestness of manner, his perseverance under difficulties, and his dogged persistency in the advocacy of his advanced ideas, were his weapons and arguments rather than the wisdom of his views. He was so far in advance of the people and the majority of his party in all his measures of political policy and economy, that people and party followed him doubtingly and cautiously, and more from a confiding trust in the correctness of the ardent advocate than from conviction resulting from his assertions and arguments. It was in thus educating people and party up to his views that Mr. STEVENS did his greatest work in national politics, and, in spite of his demurrer, made a history which will eventually be recognized as a proud one.

These peculiarities of decision and pertinacity have characterized Mr. STEVENS from his earliest youth; and in every phase of his long career they have ever been prominent. He was born at Danville, Caledonia County, Vermont, on April 4, 1793, of poor and illiterate parents. He once described his father as "not a well-to-do man," and his mother as "one of the most remarkable women he had ever known." It was to her industry and energy, and the fact that he was delicate and lame, that he owed his education. His brothers were strong and stout, and the mother, as do many other just as good and equally illiterate mothers, thought they could be good and prosperous farmers without special education, and so she devoted her frailest and weakest boy to higher professional duty, and educated him for a lawyer. "The family were poor," said an old neighbor and schoolmate of the deceased statesman, narrating the circumstances of his youth, "and Mrs. STEVENS was one of those hard-working mothers, who toil from morning till night, week in and week out. She would have worked her fingers to the bone that her boy might get book-learning. THADDEUS was a sickly boy, and very lame. Folks never supposed they'd be able to raise him. He was still and quiet like; different from the rest of boys—and sometimes they'd laugh at him, boy-like, and mimic his limping walk. They didn't mean any harm, but THADDEUS was a sensitive little fellow, and it rankled. I've always thought perhaps that's the reason he has never been back to the old homestead." In speaking once of the struggles of his mother, he used the expression that she was "a very extraordinary woman," and added that the "greatest gratification of his life resulted from his ability to give his mother a farm of 250 acres, and a dairy of fourteen cows, and an occasional bright gold piece, which she loved to deposit in the contribution box of the Baptist Church which she attended." This always gave her great pleasure, and him much satisfaction.

His education was finished at Dartmouth College in 1814; and two years after he was admitted to the bar of Adams County, Pennsylvania. He soon after entered politics as a Whig, but it was not until 1833 that he was elected to an office. He remained in the Pennsylvania Legislature until 1839, when he was defeated by a Democratic competitor. He shortly after removed to Lancaster County to practice law.

It was during his Legislative career that he succeeded in passing, and subsequently in defeating the effort to repeal, the common school laws of the State. This he once declared was, in his mind, "the crowning utility of his life," and next to the ability to fill his mother in her old age, the one act which gave him most satisfaction to reflect upon. The hostility of the Democracy and the wealthy tax-payers of Pennsylvania to its educational system in 1835 is almost incredible to the present generation, but so bitter and powerful was it that in the year named a Legislature pledged to its repeal was elected by a hearty majority. Mr. STEVENS was returned from his own county only by a small majority, and under positive instructions to vote for the repeal of the law. Instead of doing so he became its chief defender, and when the bill repealing the law came from the Senate, where it had passed, to the House, he made what is considered to have been the most effective speech of his life.

"During its delivery," says a writer in the Philadelphia Press, "in the hall of the House at Harrisburg the scene was one of dramatic interest and intensity. THADDEUS STEVENS was then 45 years of age, and in the prime of life; and his classic countenance, noble voice, and cultivated style, added to the fact that he was speaking the holiest truths and for the welfare of all human causes, created such a feeling among his fellow-members that for once the least our State legislature saw above all selfish feelings and responded to the instincts of a higher nature. The motion to repeal the law failed, and the member of votes pledged to sustain it were changed upon the spot; and what seemed to be an inevitable defeat was transformed into a crowning victory for the friends of common schools. Immediately after Mr. STEVENS concluded this great effort he received a message from GEORGE WOLFE, then Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania, and a leading member of the Masonic fraternity. Governor WOLFE was the firm friend of popular education. Of a different and more methodical character, he did not and could not rise to the movements and the attributes with which God had clothed THADDEUS STEVENS, but he was earnest and sincere. When Mr. STEVENS, in response to his invitation, entered the Executive chamber, he threw his arms about his neck, and with tearful eyes and broken voice thanked him for the great service he had rendered to our common humanity."

Mr. STEVENS entered Congress in 1848, and served until 1853; he was re-elected in 1858, and remained a member of the House until his death. Since 1860 he was Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and also served on several Special Committees, among others that on the death of Mr. LINCOLN. As the author of the Impeachment movement he was naturally made one of the Managers of the Impeachment by the House of Representatives.

The illustrations on our first page and on page 548 are, besides the admirable portrait of Mr. STEVENS, representations of the death-bed scene and the body lying in state under the dome of the Capitol. The calm and peaceful death of Mr. STEVENS has been fully described in all the papers of the country. He was surrounded at the time by his relatives, Rev. Dr. ENDOR, Dr. YOUNG, his physician, two Sisters of Charity, and two colored clergymen (one of whom, curiously enough, was at the death-bed of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS). About the last utterances made by Mr. STEVENS was an order to admit the colored clergymen to pray with him. He was baptized by one of the Sisters of Charity a short time before he expired. His death was so quiet that those in the room could not believe that he was dead. His only residence, during the last moments, to national affairs, seemed to be addressed to his nephew. "SIMON," he said, "the great questions of the day are reconstruction, finances, and the railway system of this country. I believe GRANT will be elected, and that he will carry out the great Reconstruction laws."

The body was removed on August 13 to the Rotunda of the Capitol, and there exposed to view. The coffin was borne to the Capitol by five colored and three white pall-bearers. It was deposited under the centre of the dome, in the catafalque on which the remains of Mr. LINCOLN lay three years ago, and immediately at the feet of the life-size statue of Mr. LINCOLN. The guard of honor were the officers of the Butler Zouaves, a colored military organization of Washington. The body thus lying in state was viewed by five or six thousand persons—white and black.

BEREAVED.

The gay, glad year was yet in its prime,
When I lost the pearl I had only won
At the close of the previous summer-time—
The pearl of my life, and her little one.

The younger drooped when the elder died—
Followed her over the broad black River,
Leaving the gay in my soul more wide,
A gap that will gape therein forever.

My loss has darkened my manhood's dawn,
Has shadowed all that was once so fair,
Till the sky of my life is quite o'erdrawn
With the woes that Sorrow has woven there.

And oftentimes, when the restless ghost
Of that vanished twelvemonth haunts my brain,
I feel as if nipped with a sudden frost,
And racked with a something worse than pain.

Yet I bear it all with a bold, brave front,
And go on facing life as before,
With an inward anguish naught can blunt,
And a void in my heart for evermore.

THE LAWYER'S STORY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

EXPLANATORY.

No lawyer in the city of more than thirty years' standing has forgotten that celebrated time when Judge ——, from the rural districts, held the circuit in New York and called his calendar at eleven o'clock at night. It was on one of those never-to-be-forgotten evenings when a half dozen of us, who had agreed to block the calendar and keep the Judge at work, were seated before the fire in the old Washington Hotel, expecting momentarily to hear that the Judge was charging the jury in the case then on, when our presence would be required across the Park. I say it was on such an evening that our old friend Mr. Blackstone, for by this name I choose to conceal the identity of one whom many will recognize in the account, related the incidents which form the basis of the following story. So much were we all absorbed in his narration and so deeply did we become interested in the history, that when the boy came rushing in to tell us that the Judge had directed the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff without retiring, and was actually calling the calendar, we unanimously agreed to Brother Stanley's sententious reply to his clerk who brought the message, "Tell Judge —— to go to the devil!" and we relapsed into our chairs and silence while Mr. Blackstone concluded his story. I am impressed with the idea, on re-reading the story, that I have totally failed to give it the rich tint of character and coloring of incident that his matchless powers gave it. But such as it is I let it go to the press as a sketch of some phases of life and human nature not often seen except in a lawyer's office or by a lawyer.

CHAPTER I.

It was a cold night in January, 18—. I had promised myself a quiet evening by the fireside. But my promise was made without sufficient foresight. Dinner was hardly cleared away when a sharp ring at the bell indicated the presence of either a furious client or a furious beggar. It proved to be both, for it was a poor fellow whose business I had done gratuitously for six months previously out of pure compassion for a man whose brain seemed to be wandering most of the time. His business had not been large. He had consulted me two or three times about a legacy that he expected—I never knew whence—and had made imaginary investments of his five hundred or thousand dollars in all the varieties of stock that the city could afford. And as a new stock struck his fancy he would come to me for advice as to its stability and the chances of its improvement, which advice I always gave very readily, as it cost me nothing but time, and did him no good or harm.

He was a curious-looking, gaunt, thin-featured man of thirty-five or thereabouts, and his whole life seemed bound up in this expected legacy, which he never ruled at over a thousand dollars, though he once hoped it might prove a hundred more, to enable him to buy ten shares of a stock that was above par.

He did not come in, but waited for me in the entry, where I went out to see him.

"He is dying," said he, in a loud whisper, as I appeared.

"Who is dying?"

I question whether he had ever thought of such a question before. He did not know what reply to make, for he was actually ignorant of the name of the man who was to be his greatest benefactor. He stood and thought an instant, and then said:

"Why, you know. He."

"But who is he?"

"Why he—you know—that is, you know, that —you know—he that's going to give me the legacy, you know."

"Well; if his will is made, you are all right. What do you want to-night?"

"That's just the thing, Mr. Blackstone. His will isn't made. He's put it off and put it off, and now he is in a mighty tight place, and I'm terribly afraid if you don't hurry he'll be dead before we get there."

"So I am to go and draw his will?"

"Yes, Sir, if you please."

"But such a night as this! Think of it, my dear Sir. I am not strong. Step around to Justice Hardrup's and get him to go. He'll be glad of the chance."

But there was no putting off my client. I always found my charity was decidedly the most exacting and laborious that I ever did. So I wrapped myself in a cloak and sallied out into as bitter a storm as it was ever my misfortune to meet.

Up one street and down another, into an alley, and now into an old half-falling house, and up a rickety staircase, which threatened to yield at every step, I followed my conductor into the presence of a dying man. It was evident that he was dying. The pallor of death had settled on his old and worn countenance, which was fast assuming the rigidity that precedes the last moment.

He was a very old man. His head was entirely bald, and his eyebrows were white as snow. His hand was wrinkled and thin, his arm attenuated beyond belief. His eye was restless, roving, anxious, indicating his desire to have done with the business on which I had come. His voice was husky as he addressed me, and I started at its unearthliness.

"You are Mr. Blackstone?"

"I am."

"I want you to draw my will, and quickly, for I am going fast."

I glanced involuntarily at the garret walls, the broken table and chair, and the tallow candle that made darkness visible. He turned restlessly and spoke sharply.

"You think I have nothing to leave. I have enough to pay you for drawing the will, and that is all you care for, I suppose. See here!" and he produced from under his pillow a roll of bank-bills and gold, and shook them at me with an expression of triumph, at which I could not avoid a smile.

I asked for ink, and it was produced—an old inkhorn that might have done service in the time of Job—with a pen in it that seemed as if it had been soaked there some centuries. Taking my seat at the three-legged table I demanded his instructions, and he gave them briefly

"I want to give all I have to that boy. He has been my best friend for two years, and has taken care of me like a friend. He knows I have a little to leave him, and I have promised it to him. Give him all—every farthing. Write, now. "I give all I have to——" What is your name, Tom? I never heard any thing of it but Tom."

"Thomas Wentworth."

"And what is your name?" said I.

"Solomon Storms," said he, in a clear voice and great emphasis; and I heard him add, in a low tone, "Born in old Salem and died in a garret in New York." And then he muttered something I could not hear; and when he had finished I had drawn the brief form of will for him to execute, and wanted only a witness to complete its execution. I therefore left the room, intending to go to a friend's not far distant and procure some one to act as witness with myself; but as I left the doorway I stumbled against a man who was hastening by at a furious rate, as who would have fallen but for the firm grasp he took of my collar. It was evident that he thought I was a highwayman, and, to say truth, his sudden grasp led me to think much the same way of him, for I seized him instantly by the throat. We were not badly matched, and after a brief wrestle we rolled into the gutter together, and there my cloak gave way and left me free to rise and look at my antagonist. He gathered himself up swiftly and fiercely enough, but something in my appearance convinced him I was no robber, and he instantly commenced an apology for his rudeness, to which I replied by taking all the blame to myself; and then begged him, if a citizen, to save me any further trouble by stepping up to the garret I had left and witnessing the will of the old man.

To this he readily assented, and we returned together to the presence of the dying man, for such he evidently was. The will was signed, and as he handed it back to me he gave me a package of papers and money which he requested me to keep for his heir and deliver when he should be dead. I wrote my name as a witness, and then handed the will to my late antagonist, who signed in a swift and marked handwriting:

"Walter Ashmun, New York City."

At the very instant of his finishing the signature there was a change in the old man's countenance; a shudder passed over his entire frame, and lingered about his lips; he mounted once as if he would have spoken but could not; he fixed his weary old eyes upward as if he strove to penetrate a cloud that overhung him, but could see nothing but mists of darkness; he looked swiftly and even wildly, at each of us, and then fell his hands up imploringly, and they fell heavily on the rugged coverlet, and he was gone from the company of those that knew him not to the presence of those who had known his boyhood eighty years before.

As I turned from the bed I saw Ashmun standing with his eyes fixed on the dead man, with a curious expression that puzzled me.

I looked at him inquiringly, but he did not move for some moments; and when he caught my eye fixed on him he turned abruptly from me, hurried down the staircase, and disappeared.

"HE PRODUCED FROM UNDER HIS PILLOW A ROLL OF BANK-BILLS AND GOLD, AND SHOOK THEM AT ME."

Such was my introduction to one of the most remarkable men I have ever known. I have related this occurrence only for the sake of showing how I became acquainted with him, and what I have thus far told you has nothing more to do with my story.

He was not like any other man that I remember to have seen, either in personal appearance or mental structure. He was a strange compound of common-place and sentiment, fury and gentleness, polish and roughness.

I had, of course, no opportunity to observe this at the period I have spoken of. It was not till some time later that my actual acquaintance with him commenced; for, when the will of the dead miser was proved, I was not present in the Surrogate's office on the same day that Ashmun was examined, and I did not meet him again for nearly or quite a year, during which time I had entirely forgotten his features and his personal appearance.

I was seated in my office one winter morning, zealously discussing the paper, when I was interrupted by the entrance of a man whose appearance arrested my attention. He was tall, fifty years or more of age, with an eye like an eagle's, small, quick, piercing, but unsteady. As he opened the door he looked at me, then at the table, then at the shelves, which contained a very liberal display of calf-skin, and finally fixed his eyes on my face, he smiled in very sudden smile, but very cold and harsh withal, and bowing politely he said that he hoped he had the honor then of addressing Mr. Blackstone. I admitted my personal identity in as amiable a tone as possible, glancing involuntarily at the same moment toward the clock to see how near I was to the time for an important appointment.

He advanced a step and stated his desire to speak with me, and also mentioned his name, "Ashmun." I started immediately. Strange that I did not recognize that fact face, by one but to be remembered. In his youth it had been a fine, a noble face. It still retained much of its original beauty, but the lines of life had written much, most of the delicacy of feature which once constituted its expression. There was on it an appearance of care, a look of heavy and habitual thought, as if all the pleasant things of life had been long shut out from his soul, and bitterness of one sort or another had taken possession. Yet there was a magnificence about his forehead and eyes, a look which was as if it might have been a memory of former splendor of intellect, and which at the same time was so indicative of a present powerful mind, that you paid involuntary respect to the man whose soul looked out of such windows.

While he continued silent for the space of forty seconds I had resolved all this in my mind, and then apologized for not recognizing him sooner, alluding to the strange scene in which I had last met him.

He waived the apology with an air of the most perfect polish, and took a chair and fixed his eyes on the floor with a vacant look, void of expression, which puzzled me considerably. I made up my mind rapidly that he was a brokendown man. But I was wrong. He was a man of large wealth, of acute intelligence, and, by the few who knew him, most envied of any in the city. I was surprised, as he told me his errand, that I had not before remembered who he was, for it suddenly flashed across my mind that he was the wealthy, eccentric man who lived in the stately mansion in — Street, of whom I had often heard during the past four years.

He raised his eyes to mine, and as he caught my look a mask seemed to fall off from his face. A sudden flash of lively intelligence lit up his features, his eye gleamed with unusual lustre, and now, with the pleasantest imaginable smile, and a voice of exceeding richness of tone, he addressed me:

"I must apologize, Mr. Blackstone, for my apparent absence of mind. Few things afford me pleasure of seeing you—perhaps I should say the pleasure of fighting you—I have desired to meet you again. Your remarks that you made on that evening were impressed on my attention. There are certain matters which I desire to communicate to a professional man like yourself. I have never been able to make up my mind to such a communication until very recently, and I have been doubting my brain until this morning, and determine how best to tell my story. Strangely, it never until now occurred to me that the best course I can pursue, and indeed the only possible way, is to give you a plain account of my wishes, and so much of my past history as will be necessary to explain them. When can you give me an hour?

"Next Friday morning at this time, if it will suit you, I will be at leisure," said I, after looking over my note-book.

"Could you call any evening?"

"Here at my office?"

"No, but at my house. To be frank with you, I want a little more than a lawyer. Come and see me, hear me talk, learn what I want, and advise me as a man would advise his friend."

"Now you flatter me. I shall suspect you have some sinister motive if you give such reasons for wishing to see me. As a lawyer I should not ask how you came to ask my advice, nor have certainly a right to know why you seek me of all others for a friend."

"Not because I have seen any thing specially prepossessing about you."

"I should think not. For you never saw me except over the death-bed of that poor dog that died on his heap of gold."

"You called him a dog to his face."

"Did I?"

"You did, though he was dying. You told him, frankly, that you considered him detestable, and that his death was a good riddance to the world. I liked your boldness. It was the truth, spoken so plainly, and I believe you will speak it to me. But come and see me, and talk with me, and perhaps you will better understand me. Will you come?"

"To-morrow evening."

"I will expect you."

And so he left me.

I found him the next evening in his library. It was a large room with high ceilings, and shelves loaded with rare volumes of every language, old and new. Statuettes looked down from their perches with the most lifelike appearance, and it was only on a second look that you found them to be casts. Quaint devices caught the eye in the heavy carvings, and phantoms seemed to be standing in the corners, which the faint light of a shaded lamp of costly workmanship and heavy chasing at length resolved into statues of the old gods.

Reading by this lamp, and directly underneath it, sat the master of the house. His book was an old and unpublished work, and as my eye rested on the well-known imprint made by the hammer striking the rock—and the name Diodorus per Petrum, 1556, I smiled.

His eye caught the smile, for he was accustomed to the dim light of the room, and as he rose to welcome me, and acknowledged my low with a most courtly reverence, he spoke in a voice whose silver tone was in accordance with the room, the light, the carvings, and the statuary.

"You find me in the humor to talk with you. I see you notice my old companion here."

"Not at your companion, Sir. In faith, I seldom smile at Plato. I have oftener tears in my eyes for the man than smiles. I smiled for pleasure at meeting with so good an edition in your hands."

"Ah! yes." I used formerly an old London edition. 'Until one day, as I was strolling along a street in Amsterdam, I caught sight of this. I bought it, found it was now not so rare, and have read every page over a hundred times since then. You read Plato?"

"Seldom now. I did read Plato once, most constantly; but he and Chitty hardly work well together. I have little time for dreaming."

"Plato never dreamed. I wish I had hardly have read him aright if you thought that."

"I said not that he did. But you can not read him without dreaming, at least sometimes. Plato now. None of the old philosophers, not even Aristotle, the prince of philosophers, and the original mind of the world, 'Aristotelicus,' not even Aristotle can find students now. We read, we love to read, we devour them over and over again, and always with new delight, new pleasantries, vagaries, and dreams. What were you dreaming of when I entered? Tell me the truth, for I never told myself a lie."

"By Jove you are right! Well, I am a dreamer all the time. No one ever told me so before. I never told myself so. I like your telling me so. It is just what I want. Some one to talk to me and help me break the bonds I have put on myself. I am a dreamer, and uncertain. I want life, freedom, freshness of thought and action. Yes, I am a dreamer. And when you came in I was thinking of the Yosemite valley, as I sat under that lamp reading Plato, that I was a student, a plain sort of a man seeking knowledge. That was a dream, certainly, as I read that lamp. I had it carved. But the centre, where the gold was, is more valuable than the gold which surrounds it. Plato is the centre. Dug up there. I don't know where; but the best Greek I have ever seen wrote by it. The gold it was from the very spot where stood the chair of Socrates. Of course I didn't believe him; but I liked the idea. Sometimes we have to give gold to help it. Men would more readily believe a golden than an iron lie. I had it cased in precious metal, and got to believing myself. I was my own first convert. So I read Plato, and dream that I am using the lamp over which he used to bend. What harm is there in it? The dream while it lasts is as good as the reality; and if 'we are such stuff as dreams are made of,' why we are some of us made of glorious stuff. Is it not so?"

"Yes, till the sleep comes."

"Ay, there it is. The waking is always terrible."

"Always?"

"Yes, always. Don't frown at that. I have no faith to look ont of this dream-land. My life has been one of trial, disappointment, madness; my days have been spent in fighting my rights so full of hideousness, that I have no faith left in the world, in man or woman, master or servant, friend or foe, life or death. I scarcely believe in heaven or hell. You look surprised. I am skeptical of every thing. I have lived so long in this old room in books, reading, studying, dreaming, as you called it, that it all seems to me like a dream, and there seems to be nothing real around me."

"I am tired of living in this way. I have one object in life that I want to resume. It is a search that I have been engaged in so vainly, as I have been thinking of renewing it ever since. You must help me. Can you?"

"I will listen to it."

"Cautious? Very well. Will you prepare a will for me, a plain, simple will, one that I can believe will survive me—will outlast this dream which I call me?"

"Impossible."

"Impossible! I have not heard the word before in years. I once found a queer-looking stone in Egypt. It was an altar-stone of some old heathenish temple. I wanted to smoke tobacco in a pipe made of a piece of that stone, and to ponder on the evanescent nature of men's temples, altars, and creeds. I suggested the wish to my Arabs. An almost universal shrug of the shoulder was the only reply. Old Ibrahim opened his lips to utter that word, or the Arabic for it. I stepped his mouth with a piece of gold, and there lies the pipe. I smoked tobacco in it a fortnight afterward, sitting in a newly-opened tomb, on a mummy which I chose to think was once a worshiper at that altar. Three or four thousand years ago, had some swarthy neighbor of his suggested such a future mischance to him and the altar, he would have said impossible. But it was so, nevertheless, as I enjoyed thinking while I studied the hieroglyphics on his breast."

"And yet you wish me to make for you a document that will admit of your faith in its validity and perpetuity. How do you know what revolutions may overturn law, or what freak of fancy may mislead my brain, or what doubt will haunt yours, founded on some dark spot in the paper which may cause its eagress it, which your imagination will construe into an erasure fright fully loaded with future discussions and manifold interpretations? Make you a will that you will have faith in? My dear Sir, you are trifling with me."

My singular friend looked at me for two minutes without reply. He was manifestly examining my face to determine whether I was serious. At length an odd smile flashed out of one corner of his right eye, and at the same time an expression of quiet satisfaction settled on his countenance.

"I understand you, and I thank you again for your frankness. You can help me, I think, Stephen" (to his butler, who entered in response to the bell), "some wine and tobacco. Do you use a pipe or cigar?"

"A pipe, if you will allow me."

"Allow you! I believe there is not a cigar in the house. Mr. Blackstone, I presented you were a man of my sort, and I only asked you because—"

"You had some little doubt about it."

"Exactly so. I will have a cigar-case. If, indeed, I can call it so. For it is more to gratify a whim that I have asked you here than with the expectation of receiving your valuable aid or advice. I am afraid that my desire is out of my reach or yours. Draw your chair up to the grate. Help yourself to the Madeira. There is cheese and brandy, if you prefer it. I drink no wine but the long cork."

"No? I."

"Odd again. You learned that, of course, in travel. But, pardon me, I am wasting your valuable time, and must not detain you longer from my story."

"My dear Sir, the evening is wholly at your disposal."

"Is it so? I thank you heartily. I may then take time to relate all that I wish. Stephen, some more coal on the grate. The night is growing furious out of doors. Listen to the snow on the window. Is it not terrible? God of heaven, I shudder at the thought that I could ever be lost in this tempest, unclothed, unloved, desolate, forsaken, lost—lost!"

HOW IT ALL HAPPENED.

RAT-TAT—that's the postman—two letters for Mrs. Olinthus Lobb, Cedar Villa, Putney, and Charlotte says, "If you please, ma'am, two letters for you." Charlotte must be dreaming, and I shall awake to find myself still Miss Britannia Plummidge.

I have been married six weeks last Wednesday, and yet now, when any body suddenly calls me Mrs. Lobb, I have to pinch myself to make sure I am still flesh and blood. Ah! young people get accustomed to things quickly; but then Mrs. Lobb is my mother-in-law's name for forty-seven years, it seems impossible even to change it. However, I've changed mine by a miracle.

Now I am going to tell how it all happened. Pamela and I are the daughters of a colonel in the army. Colonel Plummidge as long as I can remember; and when he died he left us our little cottage and £60 a year. He denied himself many a pleasure and luxury, and the memory of our father is very dear to us. We tried to do as he would have wished us, and some years ago Pamela Mr. Lobb, a rising young solicitor man, but a miller, offered me his hand and heart, Pamela said, "No, we have our father's position to maintain." And, in addition, very reluctantly I must own, for he was a widower, and my heart seemed to long to take care of those two dear little girls. So I refused the offer I never got another, and I began to resign myself to what seemed my ordained portion.

Bluffield, Pamela's home, is about twenty miles from London. It was our rule to go to town twice a year to receive our dividends, to buy any special article of dress we needed, and to feast our eyes on the tempting beauties displayed in the shop windows. This had been a plan of our dear father's, and I think the London day we often spoke of him—how surprised he would have been at this alteration, or that improvement, or how pleased at something which drew forth our wonder or admiration. On this particular occasion Pam had been staying with a friend of ours at Pennicuike, and agreed that we should meet to do our business, spend the day, and return home together in the evening. Five minutes to nine the train was to start; but I was so afraid of not being in time, that I was ready at half past seven. It being ridiculous to leave home at that hour, I took up a book—not that I could read either, because of the unpleasant feeling that I might forget something which Pam would be certain to ask for. Eight o'clock struck. It would only take twenty minutes to walk slowly to the station, and I had then half an hour to spare. No matter, I would start at the quarter past, in case of accidents. And a very fortunate thing it was I did start: for I had passed Bull's Cross when I discovered I had no pocket-handkerchief. However, I had time to hurry back and get one from my pocket. At Bull's Cross I thought that that trifling incident would be the means of bringing about the great event of my life!

When I reached the platform I looked about, but saw nobody I knew. The guard put me into an empty carriage, and though several of our gentlemen passed they only nodded "good-morning." So alone I started, but not to remain alone long, for at every station people got in and got out until we reached Chingford. Here I thought I was to be left by myself again, but just as the train was moving off a middle-aged gentleman rushed up. The guard opened the door of my carriage, and he was obliged to jump in, making use, as I thought, of such an improper expression that if Pamela had been there she would certainly have given him a box on the ear. Our ears often deceive us. I have since found out that he merely remarked on finding a lady alone, "Mdme seule." Still at the time I felt rather indignant, and looked at the offender with some curiosity. He was a very thin, tall man, and sodidly dressed that I began to feel a little uncomfortable, and wish some one else was in the carriage with me. Why should he wear white trowsers? The day was not warm. Were they made of duck or jean? I suppose I must have been scanning his garb, for presently he said, in a loud voice:

"Well, Madam, may I ask if you see any thing peculiar in my dress that you are honoring it with so hard a scrutiny?"

I really thought I must have sunk through the seat of the carriage. I tried to stammer out an apology, and to shield his head with my bonnet, an ironical leer, saying, "Oh, no offense, no offense." Well, what with my confusion and annoyance, I was ready to faint. I felt I thought I was mad; but if you suffered from rheumatism as I do, Sir, you would not like to be put upon a person who put you in a draught as your natural enemy."

I certainly felt devoutly thankful now that Pamela was not with me, or there would have been quite a scene. We stopped once more, and took in two ladies and a gentleman. The train moved on, and now I felt my gruff neighbor muttering, and muttering something it would do to somebody, when I discovered that his nose was beginning to bleed, and he was searching vainly in his pocket for a handkerchief. I must confess my first feeling was not one of sorrow for him. He had been so rude, I considered, that to me—an unprotected female with nobody to retaliate for her; but then I remembered how near I had been in a similar plight to his; and I was startled at the time I did, I should have been minus a handkerchief too. I involuntarily put my hand in my pocket, as there is no telling to what height I could rise, and there I found a folded up; but I would not take it out to make matters worse by unnecessary display. At this time the poor gentleman was obliged to lift his head out of the window. The ladies exchanged looks expressive of my thinking that pleasure; the young man eyed him with a leer of the most offensive indifference, as if at were the usual thing to travel with people who chose that their noses should bleed. I could not decide whether to interfere with him, only he wished to impress upon us that he was at no loss, for he produced a spotless handkerchief, and I took it out of my pocket a most unnecessarily, and I thought heartlessly; and then a small voice began to whisper, "Britannia Plummidge, are you acting a Christian part? Have you never heard a story of a good Samaritan?"

I putmy hand into my pocket again; I tried to feel as if it was one of my best handkerchiefs; I argued that as if I had two it would be different, but you never supposed that I carried myself for somebody you didn't know. Why, one might do nothing else but give away pocket-handkerchiefs! I believe there was I thought he would never approve of it, and must never know of it. Oh, it was exactly like one of my Quixotic fits! I triedto be certain I was making myself very ridiculous, and I resolved to entertain the notion no longer. But, in spite of trying to look at the passing country and to compose myself, I would purchase, how best lay out my small amount of money, memory would prick the "sweet story of old," and I felt as though my head from a feeling that I was not one of those who tried to "go and do likewise." Without a moment's hesitation I drew out my pocket-handkerchief, embroidered with "B. P." in the corner, saying:

"I am afraid, Sir, you are put to inconvenience. Will you accept this? I shall not require it."

I could not see his face; but from the side glance I got, I think it wore an expression of great astonishment. However, he took the handkerchief without a word, and I quite imagined he did not intend thanking me. Presently he drew in his head, his face looking redder than ever with the close proximity of the white handkerchief, and said:

"Madam, I am obliged to you—very much obliged to you. Madam, you're an angel. You're more: you're a woman, and the only one in the carriage, too."

Here he perfectly glared at the two ladies, who didn't seem to mind it; though, had it been me, I should have felt as if I could have shrunk into a nut-shell.

We were soon at our journey's end. My companion helped me out with the greatest politeness, and then, with the manners of a courtier, said: "May I be permitted to inquire where I shall have the pleasure of returning this?" still holding the handkerchief in his hand.

Now this was embarrassing. Pamela might blame me severely; and I should never hear the last of my indelicate liberty. Yet I felt I should like to get my handkerchief back. So after a moment I told him not to trouble himself, but should he be passing the station he might give it to the guard of the Binfield train, directed to "Miss B. Plummidge, Binfield Station, to be left until called for." He lifted his hat, and I was soon looking out for an omnibus to take me to the appointed meeting-place with Pamela.

She was there, and we spent a delightful day. I experienced some little inconvenience from the want of my handkerchief, such as when Pam would tell me to take a "black" off my nose. I had then to contrive to get behind her, and furtively rub it off with my glove. Tired enough we were when we reached home that night, but we had seen plenty to think of and to talk about. The next week passed rapidly enough, when one evening, as Pam and I were taking a walk near the station, one of the porters came up and said to me:

"If you please, Miss, there's a parcel for you here. I should have brought it up, but it says, 'To be left till called for.'"

It was a large brown-paper parcel.

"There must be some mistake," I said; "mine was but a pocket-handkerchief."

I hesitated and debated; but hesitation and debating were cut short by Pam desiring the man to take the parcel to our house; and an ominous silence was maintained till we reached home.

I remember with what trepidation I then asked whether we had not better open the parcel, and see what was in it; and though Pamela was dying of curiosity, she only said she had no desire to interfere with me in such a matter. So I cut the string, and soon my bewildered eyes were fixed on a pink brocaded silk, so rich and stiff that it would have stood alone. But there was no name, no handkerchief, nothing. I couldn't describe Pamela's wrath, nor my distress. I only know that that evening I felt that henceforth I was to be regarded as a bold woman, and a disgrace to the name of Plummidge.

And what was to be done with the unfortunate parcel? I couldn't keep it, and I couldn't send it back, because I didn't know the name of the sender. Why did I lend my handkerchief? and, when I did lend it, why was I so mean as ever want to have it back again?

Matters stood thus when we received an invitation to dinner from our doctor's wife. Now, we often went out to tea, or to small evening parties; but the circle in which we moved, in Binfield, was not much given to asking friends to dine. So this was rather an event for us. Pam became a trifle more gracious, and by the day named she was almost herself. I could have hugged her, I felt so glad not to feel the Pariah I had done for the last ten days. Pam looked very well—quite handsome I thought. I am the best work-woman, and I had trimmed her black silk with some nice lace a cousin of ours had given me, and felt quite proud of my work and my sister.

I was too taken up with the delight of having all pleasant again to think much about how I looked. Besides, Pam is so clever that people were not in the habit of taking much notice of me, unless they were deaf or invalids, and then they seemed to like to talk to me. Quite prepared to enjoy myself at Dr. Fletcher's, I entered the drawing-room behind Pam, when—oh! it couldn't be—yes it was—there on the sofa sat my eccentric friend of the railway carriage. I am perfectly sure if my nerves hadn't given way I should have rushed out. As it was, every thing and every body seemed swimming about the room; a gurgling of water sounded in my ears, and a voice seemed to come from a long way off, whispering, "Mr. Olinthus Lobb, Miss Britannia Plummidge." For fully ten minutes I had not the slightest idea what any one said or did. However, when I seemed to return to the world about me, every body was talking most agreeably to every body else, and I began to breathe again, especially when I saw that my friend did not intend showing that we had ever met before. We spent a delightful evening. Pam was quite charmed with our new acquaintance. He gave way to her, agreed with her opinions, and, though he took but little notice of me, treated us both with the greatest politeness.

I declare I thought Pam had made a conquest when he insisted on seeing us home, and asked permission to call and inquire after us the next morning. Pam had found out that Mr. Lobb was an old friend of Dr. Fletcher's, and under the shield of a fiery, quick manner, and very eccentric appearance, was always doing the kindest actions, which he would never acknowledge, or permit himself to be thanked for. Mrs. Fletcher said she advised the unmarried ladies to look after him, as he was very well off, and devoted to ladies, though, from having had an early disappointment, and spending most of his life in India and China, he had never been married.

That night, when Pam had left me, I opened my drawers and looked at the pink brocade, and smiled to think that after all I might wear that "bone of contention" at Pam's wedding, and that then she might be more indulgent about my indelicate boldness in offering my handkerchief to a stranger. I made up my mind to speak to him about the parcel should I have an opportunity, as in case of nothing coming of his attentions I could send it back. But I would be very careful in my manner and in what I said, so as not to endanger my dear sister's prospects.

A week passed, and still Mr. Lobb was at Binfield. He had a room at the "Dragon," and his attentions were getting almost pointed. I never dared breathe my thoughts to Pam, not knowing how she would take it; but when it came to inviting the Fletchers and ourselves to a little picnic, and he giving Pam his arm most of the way, I began to think she must see that all this meant something. I had never been able to speak to him; but the day after the picnic he called. Pam was out, so I mustered up courage, and told him of the parcel I had received, which I was sure had come from him; and though I knew how kindly he meant it, still I thought I would rather not accept it, as—

"As what?" he said. "You think this little trifle came from me, and yet you won't accept it? Now, I tell you what it is, Miss Britannia, I will offer you something else, and if you refuse that—why, I'll—I'll burn the dress, and I'll return—no I won't—whatever comes I'll keep that handkerchief;" and upon the spot he offered me his hand and heart, and asked me to be Mrs. Lobb.

I was never more surprised, though Pam said afterward if she ever allowed thoughts of the kind to enter her mind she should have had her suspicions. But I can not tell how thankful I was to find Pam had not taken his attentions as meaning any thing but a tribute to her superiority.

I used to smile sometimes as I saw what an amusement I and my old lover were to the young people. They could not comprehend the quiet enjoyment we looked forward to in going down the hill of life together; they were rather frightened at the red face and sharp voice, and could not understand that his heart was as fresh as that of the youngest of those who laughed.

I was pleased to find that many people would miss me and be sorry to lose me; and when we were married, notwithstanding Mr. Lobb gave my old people a dinner, and my school children a treat, there were sad faces at parting. My dear husband says he is getting all his sharp edges rasped off, and he knows his friends think him henpecked, and pity him. When he allows his voice and manners to be more like his soft, tender heart, he says: "Well, well, my dear! soon there won't be much left of old Lin Lobb except his duck inexpressibles; and, I can tell you, I won't leave them off, for they first attracted the attention of the woman who has made me the happiest man in England!"

EDWIN M. STANTON.*

During these dark days the fortunes of the republic depended on the firmness of the attorney general, Stanton.

When the cabinet of Buchanan had become disorganized through the resignation of so many of its members, there were three things of supreme importance to the nation to be done: 1st, to secure the Secretaryship of War; 2d, to secure the Secretaryship of the Treasury; 3d, to make Washington safe from seizure.

As respects the War Office, when the defalcation in the Department of the Interior was detected, and Floyd's acceptances found in place of the stolen Indian bonds, it became impossible for that minister to continue any longer in the cabinet. With the deepest reluctance was Buchanan constrained to admit Floyd's complicity. Often was he heard by his friends to exclaim, "He can not have done it, he can not have done it!" When Floyd's letter of resignation was handed to him, foreseeing its purport, his emotion could not be concealed. His trembling hand set the crisp and crumpling sheet nearer and then farther from his eyes, which seemed to refuse their office. With difficulty he deciphered the well-known but now mazy and swimming characters. The fortunate star of the republic was for the moment in the ascendant, and, at the earnest recommendation of the attorney general, Joseph Holt, a Kentuckian, who was true to the nation, received the vacant appointment.

The peril to the republic would have been extreme had the War Office and the Treasury passed into the hands of men connected with the secession conspiracy. As respects the latter, on the resignation of Cobb, of Georgia (December 10), Mr. Thomas, who had been Commissioner of Patents, was placed in his stead; but there was reason to apprehend that Buchanan, regarding this as a temporary arrangement, might confer the office on some one who could not be trusted. The bitter altercations going on unceasingly around him perfectly unmanned him. Thus, when news came of the movement into Fort Sumter, he was sitting at the fireside in a faded dressing-gown, his slippers on his feet. At once he turned ghastly pale. With outstretched hands and in a tremulous voice, he piteously implored forbearance. Some of the conspirators were in an adjoining room.

For once, the financial embarrassments of the nation proved to be its salvation. The condition of the Treasury was deplorable. The government could do nothing without the aid of the capitalists of New York. Again the influence of the attorney general came to the public succor. Instructed partly by their own patriotism, and partly by his clear information of the existing imminent danger, a deputation of those capitalists hastened to Washington, and gave the President distinctly to understand that the Treasury Department must be placed in charge of one in whom they had confidence, and that they should not be satisfied unless John A. Dix, of their state, was selected. Hereupon Buchanan gave him the appointment.

A French writer (Laugel) says, "Stanton, Holt, and Dix saved Washington to the Union." And so, in truth, it was. The obligations of the republic to those three ministers, and especially to the first, can never be repaid. Had the Virginians succeeded in their intention and seized the city, nothing could have prevented the Mexicanization of the nation.

But the resolute action of these three determined men was signally aided by the course of the Governor of Maryland. It was the plan of the conspirators to use in their movements the Legislatures of the Border States. Hicks, the Governor of Maryland, desiring to steer a middle course, refused to call an extra session of his Legislature, though vehemently urged to that step. While he was dreaming that the great conflict might be composed through the mediation of a foreign embassador, and when he did call his Legislature together, declaring to them that "the safety of Maryland lay in maintaining a neutral position," events were rapidly marching on. Maryland, as a state, could not be brought to act [illegible]nia would not act without her. During this condition of indecision and impediment, the three energetic cabinet ministers found means to make the capital of the nation secure.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"Over every hotel door," remarks a disgusted sojourner at Niagara, "should be written: 'No feeing of servants allowed.'" The truth was, that after having the greenbacks freely extorted from him by experts, located at points less than ten feet apart, on the route to the Falls, he returned crest-fallen to the hotel, and attempted to get some dinner, without having beforehand quietly put some change into a waiter's hand. The result was, he could not get any thing to eat for a distressingly long while; and when he did have a little something brought to him, it was cold—all except the ice-cream, which was hot; and being unable to obtain a spoon with which to eat it, or even a knife or fork for that purpose, there was nothing to be done but to drink it if he wanted it at all. He found he had made a mistake at the beginning of the dinner.

Another, in commenting upon the vampire-like Saratogians, says that a genuine native will take a dollar for a glass of Congress water, and thank you without flinching; that if you rub against a hack its proprietor will demand three dollars, and should you smell of a banana or an orange you are gone unless you have a supply of small change; and advises all before going to Saratoga to go to a broker's and secure 1000 ten-cent stamps for the Congress-water boys, 500 quarter stamps for New York papers, boot-blacks, and cigars; 250 fifty-cent stamps for waiters, bows and arrows, ten-pins, and billiards; 100 dollar bills for chamber-maids, neck-ties, and barbers; and 20 five-dollar bills for wine, hack hire, etc.

Nevertheless, there is no lack of accommodations at Saratoga, with its three dozen hotels, and numerous cottages; only the sharpers must be made to understand that one has traveled before, and knows his rights.

Mount Desert Island is a favorite resort of New Englanders. It is a sightly spot, located in Frenchman's Bay, east of the mouth of the Penobscot River. There is a tradition that the island was discovered by a Frenchman by the name of Des Arts; and hence the natives place an emphatic accent upon the final syllable. The island is about 60,000 acres in extent; and the view from Green Peak, a mountain 1800 feet high, is exceedingly wild and romantic. There are two hotels at Southwest Harbor, and six at Bar Harbor; and as something like a thousand permanent visitors (for the season) are reported at these two places, and more have applied but can not find accommodations, it is proposed to have some new houses built before another summer. At Mount Desert the fishing is unsurpassed, and bathing and driving are popular amusements.

Not less than forty thousand persons are said to have visited Long Branch last summer; and, if present indications are to be relied upon, the number will be greater this year. Hotels and cottages are full, and an animated scene may be witnessed every day on the arrival of the trains.

Before the opening of the Methodist camp-meeting at Sing Sing this year quite a village had sprung up in the grove. It is about thirty-six years since the Methodists of New York city and vicinity began to hold camp-meetings upon this ground; consequently those who have grown up in the habit of resorting there every year feel a strong attachment to the spot; and it has become a custom with many to pitch their tents there several weeks before the meeting, and to remain after its close.

Almost every body has heard of the "old silver trumpet," whose clarion call still rings as clear as ever through the camp-grounds. It is a genuine trumpet, of solid silver, twenty-six inches long, and of elegant figure and great purity and sonority of tone. On its tube is engraved the inscription: "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain." This trumpet is much older than this camp-meeting.

The Louisville Courier gives an account of the shocking death of a Catholic priest, by accidental burning. It states that it had been the custom of the priest—B. J. Spaulding—to keep a gas-light, with a sliding tube, burning in his bedroom at night. It seems that, during the night, the tube slipped down and came in contact with the mosquito bar. In a few moments the bed-clothing caught fire; and when the unfortunate man awoke, he was enveloped in flames. He managed to extinguish the fire on his person, but not until his flesh was shockingly burned. In his terrible agony he rushed into the bath-room adjoining, and bathed in cold water, which had the effect of intensifying his sufferings. His calls for help soon brought a friend to his room, and medical aid was promptly summoned; but before the arrival of the doctors he became frantic with pain, and a second time immersed himself in the bath-tub. On the arrival of the physicians the proper remedies were applied for his relief, but to no purpose. He lingered in great agony until death relieved him of his suffering. His resort to water is supposed to have caused the fatal result.

New York, as well as several other cities, has been greatly excited in regard to the cattle plague, which has been very fatal among Western herds transported hither. Beef has been at a discount in our markets—more probably from mere apprehension than from any well-grounded belief that any diseased meat will be offered for sale at a respectable market. The details of this malignant disease have probably been published in every newspaper throughout the country. At present the matter is receiving the strictest and most careful attention from the Metropolitan Board of Health. The diseased animals have been killed, orders issued to prevent the transportation of any sick or infected cattle; disinfectants are used wherever needed, and the most stringent regulations issued in regard to the offering of any portion of diseased animals as food. This will be regarded as a culpable offense, and will be punished with the heaviest penalties the law allows.

During the week ending August 8 there were 751 deaths in New York city. Of these no less than 538 were children under five years of age. This mortality is largely due to the impure and injurious food consumed. Unripe and decaying fruits and vegetables are offered for sale and recklessly eaten. It should be a punishable offense to offer for sale any kind of unwholesome food.

After much contradictory gossip about the matter, Mlle. Adelina Patti has become the Marquise de Caux. The marriage took place in London, on the 29th of July, at the Roman Catholic chapel of St. Mary, Clapham Park. Her husband, the Marquis de Caux, is a nobleman attached to the Imperial Court of France. He is about forty-two years old, and his bride twenty-five. The marriage ceremony was short, and, of course, performed in Latin. The bride wore a robe of white satin, seen through a covering of white tulle, and her head was adorned by a wreath of orange blossoms, from which fell a veil of rich Brussels lace, descending almost to her feet. She looked extremely well and in most cheerful spirits. Her bridemaids were attired in white muslin trimmed with blue satin; their head-dresses consisting of elegantly-shaped bonnets to correspond, ornamented with the same colored ribbon, and surmounted with a luxuriant display of forget-me-nots. It is announced that Madame de Caux is to commence a short engagement at Homburg on the 15th of August; and will shortly reappear at the Italian Opera of Paris, and also fulfill her engagement at St. Petersburg.

Omaha has twelve churches and two wide business avenues full of stores. There are three large hotels in the place, fifty lawyers, twenty-five physicians, one Republican and one Democratic daily paper. The schools are not yet as well organized as they should be, but the people seem thoroughly interested in educational matters. The city lies 967 feet above the sea; the air is very dry and invigorating—excellent for consumptives.

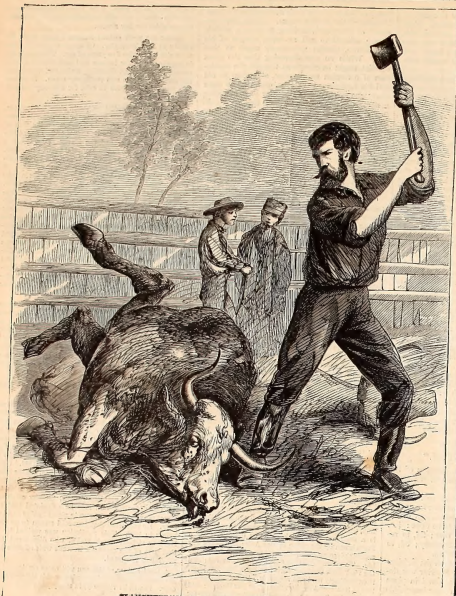
Fifteen hundred people dined at Congress Hall, Saratoga, one day last week.

Encke's celebrated comet will make its appearance about the last of August, according to the best calculations. It passes around the sun once in a little more than three years. This comet was discovered by M. Meltholn, of the Paris Observatory, in Aquarius in 1786; by Miss Caroline Herschel, of England, in Cygnus in 1795; by M. Bouvard, of Paris, in Ursa Major in 1805; and by M. Pons, of Marseilles, in 1818. Upon this last discovery, M. Encke, of Berlin, whose name it bears, calculated with great exactness the elements of its motion, and found them to coincide with the elements of the previous comets, thereby establishing their identity, and also he calculated that the comet moved round the sun in about twelve hundred days. He predicted that it would return to its perihelion in 1822. This prediction was verified by M. Bumker at New South Wales, who discovered it in that part of the southern heavens which Encke had previously indicated.

A total eclipse of the sun will occur on August 18. No smoked glass will be needed in this vicinity, however. It will be visible (?) in many parts of the Eastern hemisphere.

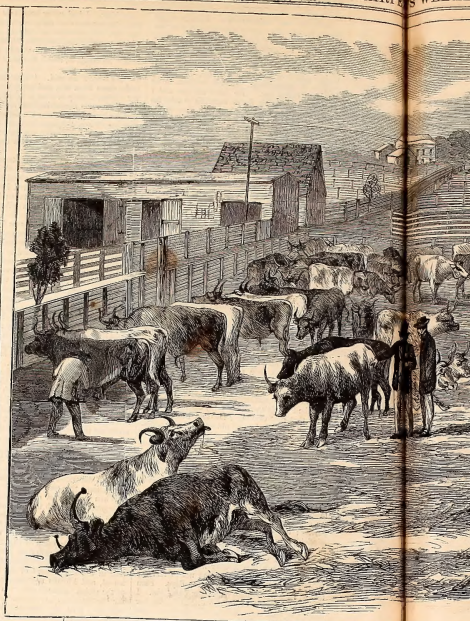
According to the Nashville Gazette, a mysterious robbers' cave has been discovered in the vicinity of Carthage, Tennessee, on the banks of the Cumberland River. The attention of some boys who were fishing was attracted by seeing baskets lowered by ropes from the rocks above. The children concealed themselves and patiently watched for further developments. The baskets continued to ascend and descend, and finally, toward night, a suspicious-looking man came out of the cave, got into one of the baskets, and was drawn to the top of the precipice. The boys imparted this information to men in the neighborhood, and early the next morning investigations led to the discovery of an immense cavern. This cavern the men explored but a short distance when they were startled by the groans of a human voice coming from a dark recess in the cavern, and the emaciated and almost lifeless form of a man stretched upon a heap of straw, and securely tied with ropes, was found. He was immediately rescued, and medical attention provided; but as yet appears unable or unwilling to tell the awful secrets of his prison.

A sarcastic writer, commenting on ladies and their toilets at watering-places, remarks: "Men do not faint; ladies do, whenever they are not attired in their new, white, snowy muslins. Natural instinct keeps them up if any very pretty thing they have on would not bear the dash of a basin of cold water. The frill, flounce, and puff style abhors crumpling as naturally as mad dogs do the river."



The tropical heats of July are said to have literally burned up the crops throughout a large portion of the Russian Empire. Indications show that there will be great distress if not a positive famine there during the coming winter. In France, however, the harvests will be uncommonly fine. The wine crop in particular will not only be one of the most abundant ever known, but will be superior in quality.

The statistics of the Labor Exchange in San Francisco give some interesting and curious facts in regard to the different prices paid to mechanical laborers. For example: bell-makers have $2 00 a day; bell-hangers, picture-frame makers, and varnishers, $2 50 a day; stone-cutters and wagon-makers, $4 00 a day; carpenters, from $3 00 to $4 50 a day; bricklayers, plasterers, and machinists, $5 00 a day; and smelters, $7 00 a day. They are paid in gold.



A visitor at Stamford, Connecticut, says that if some of the mosquitoes there were only painted with the right colors he should mistake them for canary-birds, they are so sizable and musical. The supposition is that they do not bite—canary-birds never do!

The Early Rose Potato has been, and still is, a subject of interest among agriculturists. This variety of potato was originated by Albert Brezee, of Rutland County, Vermont, in 1861. After being tested three years it was offered for sale. The demand became so great that the potatoes sold by the pound at almost fabulous prices. They are reported to be two or three weeks earlier than any other variety, excellent in quality, and very productive.

Among certain Amazonian tribes the Indian bridegroom is subjected to a singular test. On the day of his marriage, while the wedding festivities are going on, his hand is tied up in a paper bag filled with fire-ants. If he bears this torture smilingly and unmoved he is deemed fit for the trials of matrimony.

A HINT TO HORSEMEN.

"Do you bruise your oats?"

"Yes."

"And brush your horses by machinery?"

"No. Why ever thought of such a thing?"

Well, try; and make the same fly-wheel that turns your chaff-cutting machinery do duty to put a polish on your chestnuts, and they will shine like satin. Hair-brushing by machinery is hardly applicable to human heads; none but the shortest crop of tresses and the toughest of skins being able to support it; while fine hair, if not torn out by the roots, is apt, if long, to get round the spindle and scalp the patient before he can say, "Hold, enough!"—a thing not likely to occur in dressing the horse. Grooms, of course, will for a time be against the method, and old hands sadly bothered to use the rotating brush; but with several horses to dress, the saving will be great, the flying polisher passing over the surface with ten times the velocity of the hand. The use of the machine would not abolish the hand-brush, any more than the lawn-mower supersedes the occasional use of the shears for trimming round shrubs and borders. The scheme is well worth a trial. It saves seventy-five per cent. of labor, and with far more brilliant results.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

NEW YORK gets its beef principally from Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Texas; and it was no sooner ascertained, in August 10 last that a plague was raging among the cattle in and from those States than our efficient Board of Health immediately set all beef under quarantine. The sale of cattle from those States was prohibited; in many instances drovers were required to repurchase from the butchers, and consign their cattle to the "soap-fat man;" orders were issued prohibiting the reception of the cattle from the suspected States into the State of New Jersey; Governor FENTON ordered the Mayors and Health Officers of Albany, Buffalo, Elmira, Dunkirk, and Jamestown, the principal railroad cities on our western border, to allow no infected animals to pass these points for the East; Pittsburg redoubled her police to guard against their reception there; and altogether New York came very near having an excitement over the stopping of its road bed. But such is the confidence of the people in the efficiency of the present Board of Health that these summary proceedings, which under former systems of city sanitary government would have served to painfully excite all classes, rather tended to allay agitation. Hitherto the same action would have resulted in the sudden and total disuse of beef, and the markets would have been deserted; as it was the demand was as great as ever, the people apparently feeling that the vigilance and energy of the Board of Health was sufficient guarantee of the wholesomeness of the market supplies.

It appears that this disease, now prevalent in all the Northern cattle-raising districts, is not the rinderpest or the pleura-pneumonia, but a species of infectious fever of a malignant type. It appears to have been carried to Illinois by Texas cattle, and is, therefore, known as the "Texas fever." Some suppose it to have resulted originally from the close packing in cars to which the animals are subjected not only on their way to this market, but when being conveyed from various parts of the West to the packeries in Illinois and Indiana. About thirty thousand Texas cattle have been taken by Champaign County, Illinois, during the last three months, and it is supposed that the disease was generated among those during their long journey, and that the rest have been infected with it.

We devote a large part of our space to the illustration of this plague. Page 552 and page 553 will be found a number of illustrations of the reception, appearance, and disposition of the cattle—the good, bad, and indifferent—at the Communipaw abattoirs.

One of these, the first in the natural order of the story, though not first in the arrangement of the pictures, represents the "unloading of cattle from the cars." It has been argued, as before stated, that this disease results from the manner in which the animals are carried. It is not an improbable though generally disputed theory. "Without warning or preparation," writes a person familiar with the subject, "the well-cured fat and quiet animals are at once driven to the stables, turned into the cars, and started for the great markets. Wearied through the long days and hours of standing, frightened by shrill noises and the roaring of passing trains, wrenched by sudden starts, hungry and thirsty, whether in summer's heat or winter's cold, and saved from falling, in their exhaustion, only because they are packed so closely that they are obliged to stand, it may be inquired whether their prison-houses, named cattle-cars, resting on springs, and run through years, accumulated from these agonies the germs of the disease which, at last, has burst forth to ravage their unfortunate." It is understood that on all Northern roads the drovers are compelled by law to feed and water the cattle every twenty-four hours. But on the Southern roads, by which the Texas cattle come, there are no such wise regulations. And it is not certain that the Northern railroads fully comply with the law. The only place at which cattle are watered on one of the principal routes between Chicago and New York—a four days' journey—is at Crestline, and there they are not fed; and frequently, in order that the company may make up lost time, the animals are hurried through their whole journey.

When cattle received by the cars are found to be infected they are immediately slaughtered in the abattoir of Communipaw, by being knocked in the head, and immediately dragged to the steaming vats, and boiled until the grease is extracted. Both the "killing" and "dragging" processes are illustrated in our engraving. Many of the diseased cattle before they can be killed, and thus serve as the subject of another illustration. In another cut the Board of Health officers are seen collecting the diseased animals for examination; while in the centre of the engraving is a general view of the sick and dying cattle in the yards devoted to their reception.

MARRYING AN EARTHQUAKE.

IT was in the famous hotel of St. Thomas, West Indies, that I first saw Madame Barca. Many of the guests of that house—Anglo-Dane-Niggery-Yankee-Doodle island, as a clever traveller has described it, live permanently at this hotel, which is remarkable for exhibiting the strangest juxtaposition of splendor and squalor, luxury and discomfort, bustle and stagnation, coolness, indolence, and activity, and sluggishness, the whole institution being eminently representative of the conglomerate little purchase of Mr. Seward. The hotel is lovely vessel in the sea, disguising when actually visited; the high parts of it are resorted to by the people in the suburbs; it lacks not the speedy death to unacclimated seamen; the government is Danish, the language is Spanish, the business is English, and the society is eclectic, being composed of shreds and patches of Spanish aristocracy, Hebrew wealth, Englishism and Scotch colonialism, and American naval and money-making cosmopolitanism.

Madame Barca was of the Spanish aristocracy she was the widow of Don Pedro Baca del Agarva, and was immensely wealthy in lands and sugar plantations. She was plantation-like and not produce much nowadays, but her territorial possessions were vast and valuable. So those who had no rent-rolls to "hold" in the little Spanish lady paid cheerful homage to her moneybags. She was still young and pretty enough, with her dashing manners, her black, glossy eyes, her soft brown hair, and petite figure, to be easily queen of all the ladies at the hotel. Mrs. Fairday, the wife of the New York banker, splendid creature with a white skin, black eyebrows, immense arms, and all that; and the Misses Sherman, the wife of the North American naval commander stationed at St. Thomas, were very pretty New Yorkish-looking young ladies; but Madame Barca had only to sit down, begin with sweet arts of flirtation, such an unfailing stream of musical bad English she had been sent to, New York, and I was, therefore, one of the friends of mine among the officers of the United States steamer Tuscaloosha, who were intimate with her, and I was, therefore, somewhat forcefied against the sweet, but rather ostentatious and overdone attentions which the lady showered on my presence at dinner as her vis-à-vis. She was prettily dressed in the purest and freshest of white, and as she took her seat she made me a good-evenings to all and pushed down the voluminous starched folds of her dress between her neighbors' chairs with a thousand little graces. "Excuse me," she sent a long but timid glance on me, and, coloring slightly, bit her under lip, as if she feared she had made one to be hated, or perhaps annoyed the new gentleman. Several times during dinner, after her liveliest sallies in the talk, she honored me with another timid, apologetic glance, as much as to say, "I didn't mean to: it came before I thought; don't judge me hastily."

A judge her harshly! I was charmed, bewitched, conquered, and though my cold Northern propriety would not permit any sign, sight at table, to "look love to eyes that spoke again," I resolved that Madame Barca and I were to become better acquainted, and that she should find with me to her heart's content.

After dinner as I was standing in the parlor talking with the Misses Sherman and their papa, Commander Sherman, with all of whom I was very well acquainted, Le Diner came flying up the room, her skirts fluttering like the rushing of mighty pinions. She burst impetuously upon Captain Sherman.

"Oh pray, Mr. Commandator, tell me. They say the Secretary Seward buys San Thomas?"

"Yes, Madame Barca," said Captain Sherman, "the great American Naval Police Force is negotiating for this happy isle."

"Oh, then, I shall be an American," cried Madame, clasping her hands and rolling her beautiful eyes heavenward in ecstasy. "Oh, what pride! what pleasure! Then you will be my sister, Miss Kitty," she said, embracing that young lady; "and you, too, Miss Flora, kissing her"—and you our great Admiration," she shouted with a peal of laughter, putting both hands on his shoulder-straps. Then came again that appealing look—"Am I not to be free too hold? it seemed to ask. As for me, I was only anxiously thinking what I going to be to her? for I was left. The girls had seen what she was coming to, and Kitty had me all ready for the introduction, when you took place.

"I make you welcome to San Thomas, Mr. Browne," said Madame Barca, giving me her hand, and looking frankly in my eyes with the sweetest of smiles. "How do you like the new State of the United States? Will you come to be our Governor, Mr. Browne?"

"I should much prefer attaching myself as a loyal subject to the already reigning Queen of the Island," I replied, with a low bow.

Her Highness was pleased to smile at this, and graciously returned me a most sweeping courtesy. "Well, Sir Browne," she added, "I make you my Prime Minister; and you shall go to the House of Congress and make my claims on the Government—they are few."

This was a little stroke of business, for the fair widow of Don Pedro Barca had inherited from her father a long and vexatious lawsuit for damages against the United States, and she was looking out for some American to take charge of it for her. Many thousands of dollars were at issue coming on, and Madame Barca suddenly became serious and proceeded to set forth in a very clear and business-like manner the existing state of the litigation. Her case, it appeared, was very well made out, and was simple, straightforward, and honest, and I promised attention, activity, and arguments were in Spanish, and made altogether from the stand-point of the native. "It seemed so very easy," she said, and that a second-so to be urged as in accordance with the United States Government's policy with regard to our West Indian possessions.

And so I remarked to Madame Barca. She listened with pleased and serious attention, and then looked down, blushing to her like a lawyer with his client, and her listening to me like a lone widow to her adviser and protector. But business is one thing, and flirtation another in some minds, and Madame Barca was lady enough to see that she was making improper use of an evening conversation. She suddenly looked interested, abruptly turned from the subject, saying she should consult with me further upon it.

The evening went on with dancing, as it always does in the West Indies, the ladies there are so excessively fond of it. I danced with Madame Barca, and found the "quick" dances, as they call the waltz, polka, galop, and so forth, in distinction from the quadrilles, which are called the "slow dances," because they are so deadly dull, Madame Barca told me). What a strong, supple, graceful dancer she was! We seemed to have but one step between us, we like being carried through the air by a bird! In my dreams that night, need I say that Madame Barca was upon me those sea of wondrous power, beaming sweetly askance at me from beneath a stray tress of brown hair loosened in the flying dance?

The next morning while I was dressing a little note was brought me. It was from Madame Barca, written in the prettiest of sloping Italian handwriting, and requesting me in very brief and curt terms to call at her apartments that morning on business of importance. I went. Madame was in a charming morning-wrapper, and with just an engaging trifle of a languid and negligé air about her. She looked perhaps a little worn and weary, more mature—but on the evening before, and I guessed she must be a year beyond thirty. Drawing a chair close to the sofa where opposite me, she began by telling me she desired to engage my professional services in her lawsuit against the United States Government. She gave me the whole history of the case, with great clearness and infinite animation. Naturally enough, as I was getting much interested, she glided into the story of her own life, and I learned that Madame Barca was the daughter of a Spanish officer of high command, who had been beggared by a revolution, and had died with a broken heart. The eloquence and pathos of this part of her story, and her sweet sense of honor as she dried them, were very interesting, to say the least, and I was impelled to proffer her my services sympathetically. I already agreed to do now my most earnest professional exertions in her behalf. She had resolved never to marry after the husband she made could be lived, but after his death, being left without a protector, had accepted the offer of Don Pedro Barca del Agarva, who was then in the West Indies. Thomas, who had died two years ago, in the third year after their marriage, leaving her in possession of all his property. She would have chatted on through a till dinner-time had not a caller intruded upon us. I left her feeling myself deeply in her confidence, and she gave me her hand, and that long, searching look from those Spanish eyes as she closed the door, expressed an implicit, nay even a somewhat tender, trust in my interest and sympathy.

How could I refuse my charming client such poor comfort as my presence could give? How could I decline to execute the many little commissions she intrusted to my care, even though they were beyond the strict pale of the case in hand? How could I help calling daily at her rooms for consultations when she sent for me, although nothing further could be done with the suit at present? In fine, how could I help becoming gradually Madame Barca's adviser upon all things, and her constant attendant at dinner and in the evening? Any neglect on my part might endanger my position as counsel in the fat, interminable case on which I was retained, the Spanish female mind is so fickle. Supposing I had slightened any one of the daily notes from Madame Barca, requesting "Dear Señor Browne to come to her a moment to speak of something very important?"

This is what happened one day:

Captain Sherman invited me to accompany himself and daughters on a sailing party, one of the ship's yawls having been rigged up as a sailboat. We started quite early, as we wished to visit the other side of the bay. The voyage was pleasant, but without incident, save the sea-sickness of Miss Kitty, the elder of the two young ladies, who was unable to stand the heavy sea raised by a sudden squall. Her father was detained by official business at the dock when we returned, and the care of the helpless girl was devolved on me. I procured a conveyance to the hotel, by my illness was so severe that I was obliged to carry her to her room in my arms. This was just before dinner. I found a note from Madame Barca in my room. It was only the regular daily note, requesting me to see her on "very important business." It had come just after I left in the morning. I thought it of no great importance, and that a word with Madame Barca at dinner would make it all right.

But little we can be aware what hurricanes may be impending unseen above our heads (especially in the West Indies) this story of earthquake and heavy surf will show—nowhere more forcibly than right here. There were but few people at the table this evening, from some cause or other, and I sat next the Shermans and there; Mrs. Pinhoe was absent, and I was almost alone at one end of the room. Madame Barca came in, in all the splendor of beauty and blitheesomeness she usually was, but pale and still. Her mouth was set and angry—she avoided my eye, fixing hers immovably upon her chair till she got to it, and then as immovably upon the table before her. I spoke her "Good-evening," but she did not notice me, and I then held my peace. Hardly tasting of what was put before her, Madame Barca soon withdrew from the table. When I came into the parlor I saw her outline at one of the windows, the room being unlighted and quiet. I approached her and said, quietly:

"Madame Barca, is any thing amiss?"

Those wondrous eyes of hers were terrible with hate when they met. I am afraid I almost quailed beneath their fierce, threatening glare. She burst out with

"Mr. Browne, you have insulted me. Go your ways! No man shall do again such insolence to me!"

"But, my dear Madame Barca—" I stammered.

"How dare you talk to me so? Do you think me a child? You insult my note, and then come to me this way!"

"I did not see your note till a moment before dinner. I hastened down away all day."

With another of those hateful sidewise glances that I can never forget, she said, nodding her head slowly, "Do you think I don't know where you have been? Did I not see you bring that woman in your arms?"

I was amazed, to find it was a storm of jealousy that raged in Madame's bosom.

"Who? Miss Sherman?" I replied, "Miss Sherman was very ill, sea-sick in a squall that nearly swamped the boat."

"I wish she had been drowned! Oh, I wish you were both drowned in that sea!" and covering Madame Barca, rising and pointing with a wild gesture to the harbor, and glaring into my face.

"Madame," I said, utterly dumbfounded, "I will leave you then."

I turned to go, when Madame Barca threw herself back upon her chair, and covering her face with both hands, began to sob loudly.

I stopped, for I could not find it in my hears to leave the poor little lady in her present unhappy plight. Luckily I had soon a pretext for speaking to her.

"Pray be calm, Madame Barca," I said; "some one is coming."

She hushed immediately, though not without difficulty. As the page only a servant with lights, I ordered him to wait a while, and he withdrew again. I went and stood at the window by Madame Barca.

She continued to weep bitterly, and I was perplexed what to do. If I attempted to soothe her, I should only be repulsed and considered, I thought. I was still debating with myself what course I should pursue when I felt her hand laid gently on my arm. She looked up, tearful with tears, was lifted appealingly to me, and her eyes were now filled with a sad sweetness.

"Can you forgive me?" she asked. "I have been very angry and very wicked."

"There is nothing to forgive," I answered.

"Oh, yes. I am such a great devil, they say," she said, again hiding her face. "I have wronged my good friend. Oh, Mr. Browne, you have been so kind, so very generous, so noble to me that the thought of your being indifferent distressed me so much!"

"I am not, I could not be indifferent, dear Madame Barca," I replied. "I should have hastened to see you this morning, but I had your note. My anxiety to comfort her was running away with my discretion, and I went on, 'It is my chiefest pleasure to do your service. I have often feared that I have taken up too much of your attention. But something has told me I was not wholly unwelcome.'"

"Oh no! oh no!" said Madame Barca, smiling through her tears, while her sweet face, surrounded by her disordered hair, looked unutterable things. Her hand, which had again rested on my arm, tightened with a gentle pressure upon it. Instinctively I drew her against my left, my own hand sought hers. In the same way I found myself saying, the next moment, "There is something stronger than a mere business tie between us. Why should we not confess it?"

Still keeping her hand, I stepped out upon the balcony, and we seated ourselves in the corner furthest from the window.

"Why should we not acknowledge it?" I repeated, desperately: for, though I am a coward in such extreme moments, I felt that I was in for it now. I passed my hand around her waist, and she pressed closer to me, and her face buried itself in my bosom was her reply.

How long we sat this way I can not tell: we did not move, and seemed to be in perfect peace and happiness. For me, I thought of home, my country, my long-cherished plans of business, and the Santa Lucia Bay Company, my society and politics, and how this unlooked-for West Indies love affair was to affect them all. What I hoped? Could this unprotected Spanish woman love, with its tropical storms as well as warmth, compensate for all that was gone? I confess I turned my chin in the tangled hair of the face head upon my breast to look at the mansion upon the heights over the bay buried in its grove of bread-fruit and orange-trees, and reckoned the amount of pleasure the possession of it would bring me, and questioned whether I should not gaze with truer happiness upon the trees in Trinity Church-yard from my law-office window. Which was the road to life-long happiness, up the hills to the mansion, in due time, or down to the dock to-night, to the English steamer, which sailed sailed on the morrow for Havana?

The head lifted, the face turned all its sweetness again upon me—white arms were wound about my neck: "I love you!" I murmured, and kissed her. One long embrace, another kiss, and she was gone. As she disappeared in the window, with a tender look over her shoulder, I saw how it was. I loved her eyes, and was happy as long as their light beamed upon me.

They did beam upon me with undimmed splendor now for many pleasanted weeks, and I was happy enough. The courtship was like the long summer of the tropics, or say it was the Caribbean trade-wind of love. The affair was much talked about at St. Thomas when the match came out, and I believe public opinion was divided as to whether I was a "lucky dog" or not. Whatever Mrs. Grundy might have said, every body came to the wedding—the American and anti-aristocracy from the port, the Yankee sutlering aristocracy from the town, the Spanish Hidalgo aristocracy from the plantations, and the Danish aristocracy from the custom-house. We retired at once to our villa, and I was installed as monarch of all I surveyed, and queen of the finest plantation in the West Indies. Lovely groves of bread-fruit-trees, mangoes, orange-trees, pines, limes, and so forth, were mine, as I said I could.

"Walk all day, like the Sultan of old, in a garden of spices."

This was all very delightful. Madame was a sweet and happy during the honey-moon, and I was rapidly becoming completely resigned to settling down in the lap of indolence and luxury, under a broad-rimmed Panama hat. True, thoughts of the rainy season shortly to come, and of the day when the awful lightnings of Madame's eyes should break forth, sometimes disturbed my siestas. But I had not long to anticipate the day of evil.

It came like a thunder-bolt out of a clear sky. We were sitting, just before night, on the verandah overlooking the bay, enjoying the cooling sea-breeze. Suddenly the floor beneath our feet rose and fell. Madame was thrown from her seat upon my knee. I started up, but could not take a step before I was prostrated also. The stone-walls above our heads bulged and cracked and fell. The terror-stricken negroes and cattle were flying in every direction, and adding their shrieks and cries to the thunder that rolled under the ground. It was an earthquake. Though almost paralyzed with terror myself amidst the din, darkness, confusion, and impending destruction, I contrived to raise up my wife, and bore her, fainting and helpless, over the shaking ground away from the house. It was my intention to take the carriage and make for the bay, where we could take refuge on board one of the ships. But neither by threats nor entreaties could I procure the assistance of any of the negroes, who were flying from the place. So we started away on foot, the ground shuddering and heaving under our feet like a frightened horse. We were not too soon. Scarcely had we gained the open road when a shock of terrific power came, and we heard the crash of the falling walls of our villa. A small stone-house near the road, used for a restingplace on the way to the plantation, fell in: in this shock before our eyes, the stones flying from the walls as if from the effects of an explosive. What a night it was for my poor wife! Her terror was greater than mine and continually urged her forward over the rough road; but her delicate frame was not equal to the demands made upon it, and between her mental and physical suffering she became insensible under the effort. Her Jesuitical religious training made her superstitious, and she was in utter terror of an unsanctified Anglican heretic: her mind was not of the strongest, and she alternately reproached and caressed me. Her fierceness and her fondness were equally trying under the circumstances, and my feeling toward her was changing, in spite of myself, from love to pity, and from pity still further away from love.

We reached the town at last in safety. The earth was still vibrating when day broke, with frequent strong shocks. How changed was the face of the hills where our villa had stood! There was a pile of ruins in its place now, and the great trees which had stood around it were bent and pitched together at sixes and sevens.

We procured a boat, and put off for the Tuscaloosee. Captain Sherman would receive me with open arms. He had nearly reached her sides when the severest shock of the whole earthquake visited the doomed island. We saw from where we sat in the boat an immense tract of the ridge of rock above our estate slide down and sweep all before it, and an arid waste of stones silently, but relentlessly, take the place of the fertile green groves on the hill-side.

So my suddenly acquired wealth in the West Indies went more quickly than it came. No, I beg pardon, we have always come to me Madame Barca (for she returns to her widow-name here in Washington, for convenience in making her claims) and our eternal suit against the United States Government. Yes, Madame Barca is a treasure, to be sure, though I don't set much of her browning by it. At all events she is a devil among all the public men at the Capital, from Mr. Seward down to the local of the National Intelligencer. The facts, we have proved, prove so thoroughly in pushing our suit that we have both taken to lobbying for a livelihood, and I suppose no very handsomely while the Thomas business is waiting adjustment. Madame has rooms of her own at Willard's, I live in lodgings high in combining the life-long and never-ending, if not lucrative, business of lobbying with her old pastime of flirting. As for me, well—the Earthquake turned my life wrong side out and upside down.

FERGUSON'S "MECHANICAL PARADOX."

THE remarkable history of James Ferguson is of course, familiar to most of our readers. Those not acquainted with it may be pleased to know he taught himself to read books at seven, the heavens at fifteen, and art at nineteen, will find it fully detailed in Mayhew's "Life of Ferguson, and Smiles's "Self Help," both published by Harper & Brothers.

It appears by a letter of Ferguson's, hitherto little known, that one of his most famous inventions—the Mechanical Paradox—was constructed for the singular purpose of affording a skeptical watch-maker the existence of the Trinity. The letter, which is dated London, April 10, 1776, is strikingly illustrative of Ferguson's habits of thought and expression, and is all the more interesting from this fact. It is as follows:

"One evening I was at a weekly club with a friend and on our entering the room (or very soon after) a person accosted him with these words: 'Demonstrate the Trinity or Persons in the Godhead, wondering at the impudence of the question, I made as much an absurd doctrine, and at the weakness and folly of every man who believed it. I happened to sit just opposite to him, and the table between us, and (you may believe) spent the whole evening in it. I gave him a severe frowning look, on which he asked me my opinion concerning the Trinity. I told him that all my belief thereof depended upon the opinion I had of the pure knowledge, wisdom, and veracity, but that I did not think it was a proper thing to be talked of over our bowls, and glasses, as makes his own particular, be desirous of talking to him about his own business.

"Very well,' said he, 'let us talk about it.'

"Sir,' said I, 'I believe you are well how one wheel must turn another, or how a pinion must turn a wheel, and so I do.'

"I hope I do,' said he.

"Why,' said I, 'suppose you make one wheel of thick or other three, and cut teeth in them all, and then put them together with their axles upon one axis, and set the thick wheel to them, so that its teeth may take into those of the two wheels on each side of the thick wheel round: how must it turn the others?'

"Says he, 'your question is almost as difficult to comunse-sense: for every one who knows any thing of the matter knows that the thick wheel by turning which way you will, all the other three must be turned the contrary way by it.'

"Sir,' says I, 'I believe you think so.'

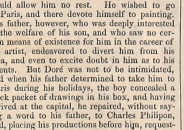
"Says he, 'I say so.' 'It is so,' said I, 'though—it is demonstration that they must.'

"Sir,' said he, 'I would have you be too cree lest you possibly be mistaken. And now, what would you say if I should tell you that the thick wheel which way you will, it shall turn one of the rhis wheel the same way that it turns itself, and the rest the contrary way at all?'

"Says he, 'I would say that there never was anything proposed that could be more absurd, as being the only thing that could not possibly come to pass, also to plain fact.'

"Very well,' says I. 'Now, Sir, is there any thing in your ideas more absurd about the received doctrine of the Trinity than in this proposition of mine?'

"There is not,' said he; 'and if I could believe the one I should believe the other also.'



"Gentlemen,' said I (looking at the company), 'you have heard what he says.'

"The watch-maker asked me whether I had ever made or seen such a machine. I told him I had not, but I believed that I could make it, although I had never thought of it till that instant.

"Your head must be wrong,' he replied; 'for no such thing could be such a thing.'

"Sir,' said I, 'be my head right or wrong, I believe I can not only do it, but will undertake to make the machine, if I may be admitted into this company, on the day you please.'

The company, who, with serious faces, were very attentive to all this, requested that I would come.

FERGUSON'S MECHANICAL PARADOX.

"So I made the machine—all of wood—and carried it (under my coat) to the same room on the day appointed: and I showed it to the company.

"Well, old friend,' says he, 'have you made your wheel?'

"Yes, Sir,' said I, 'and there it is: let us take it to pieces.' And there wheels flatly touched and flatly pitched into the thick wheel.'

"Yes, Sir,' said he.

"I then turned round the great wheel, whose teeth took into those of the three little wheels, and asked him whether the uppermost thin wheel did not turn the same way the one did? He said, 'Yes,' whether the next wheel below did not turn the contrary way, and the lowest the same way as the first?

"They do,' said he, 'and there is a fallacy in the machine.'

"Sir,' said I, 'the very detect the fallacy, and expose it to the company.'

"He looked a long while at it, took it several times to pieces, and put it together again.

"Sir,' said I, 'is there any fallacy in the machine?'

"I confess, said he, 'I see none.'

"There is none,' said I.

"Here he then, like the three thin wheels should be so differently affected? The thing is not only about the reason, but is even contrary to all mechanical principles.'

"'For shame, Sir!' said I: 'ask me not how it is; for it is a simpler machine than any clock or watch that you ever made or mended; and if you may be so easily nonplussed by so simple a thing in your own way of business, no wonder you should be so about the Trinity: but learn from this not, for the future, to reckon every thing absurd and impossible that you can not comprehend. But now I hope you remember what you said at our last meeting here—namely, that if you could believe such a thing as this, you would believe the doctrine of the Trinity. Is not this the truth of the machine; what do you say to your promise?'

"He hummed and ha'd, and asked me whether I would let him have it to show to his friends. I told him he might, but desired he would bring it to me to-morrow morning. This he promised he would, and did so; but gave it me with some hearty curses, telling me he saw it was a trick, but could not find it out. I was willed me to explain it to him, which I refused. I kept it for six years, and then gave my person who could explain the principles on which it acted, and then put the sun and planets to it. And more to vex it to seeing it would then be a kind of errery, and published the description.

As a model of the "Mechanical Paradox" may readily be constructed by any one out of a few pieces of soft wood, with the aid of a pocket-knife and a pair of compasses, we shall give a short account of the parts which may be sketched on paper and reproduced easily.

The machine consists of two pieces of thin wood, B, C, made into a frame by being joined at the corners. This frame, by the use of a handle, A, may be turned round an axle, D, which pierces the frame, and is fixed in a stationary board or table, and carries within the frame an immovable wheel. This first wheel, which we shall call B, when the frame is made to revolve, turns three other and thick wheel, E, which, like the remaining three wheels, F, G, and H, moves freely on its axis. F, G, and H, are the three thin wheels driven by the thick wheel, E, and in such a manner, when the frame revolves rapidly, that the uppermost one, H, turns the same way as E does; the second wheel, G, turns the contrary way; and the lowest wheel, F, turns no way at all. This curious result may be made more apparent by attaching wire brackets, F, F, G, G, to tubes fixed in the respective wheels, F, G, and H. In making the mandrins of pieces of wood or lead, the wheels may be all cut in the same direction; but E, and F may (D and F must) have an equal number of teeth, G, however, must have at least one tooth less, and it one tooth more, than the fixed wheel D, as in the original model. They may, however, have two or three teeth less respectively than number D, and this will increase the difference in their forward and retrograde motions.

THE STORY OF GUSTAVE DORÉ.

IN the present French school of painting, Gustave Doré occupies a high rank and a peculiar position. He has had no master; he belongs to no school, and imitates no one's path. His training, too, has been rather remarkable. He was born in Strasburg in 1832, where his father was appointed State engineer. He had scarcely reached his tenth year when his yearning for art manifested itself irresistibly. He drew in his copy-books, in his music-books, on envelopes, and no sheet of paper was safe from his pencil. The little Doré had but one wish, and this wish was to draw, and to draw all the time. He waited to go to Paris, and there devote himself to painting. His father, however, who was deeply interested in the welfare of his son, and who saw no certain means of existence for him in the career of an artist, opposed his desire with all his might.

Charles Philipon was a man of quick mind and rare warmth of heart. It was he who introduced pantomime into French theatres. At the beginning of the July Government he had established a witty paper called Les Caricatures, which it was necessary to pay curtailed on his no less than fifty-four political processes. When this paper was stopped by the September laws, he established Le Charivari, and subsequently a long series of other witty papers, some of which still exist. His fame had reached the young Doré. Philipon, who had pleased with Doré's open, free manner, gave great attention to his numerous productions, and found in them naturally all the signs of a boy working out his own direction, but at the same time he admired the rich imagination they evidenced, and the rare amount of observation, rare even among more mature artists. He did not spare his blame, but praise predominated in his words. He returned triumphantly to his father, and made him at once acquaintance with the young artist with Philipon. His father was astonished, and repaired immediately with his son to Philipon. The latter repeated his verdict upon the young artist, and concluded with these words: "Your son is born for art, and if you repress the artist spirit within him, he will only become a failure in any other career, and never achieve any thing. The saying, 'Art doesn't pay,' is not always a true one. There are artists who have made fortunes, as well as fame, and I am much mistaken if your Gustave does not some day belong to these successful artists. He is already able to support himself by his talent; and if he likes to work for my paper, I shall be glad to have him."

These words decided Doré's father to yield to his son's wish, upon condition, however, that he should yet spend two years in a school at Paris. Doré was accordingly placed in the College Charlemagne, where he in nowise belonged to the worst scholars, but he drew much for all that. At the age of fifteen he left the school-bench, and appeared as an independent artist, whose works were received with pleasure. When the February revolution broke out he drew numerous caricatures for comic journals, and surprised the public by the great number, as well as by the originality, of his works. This surprise is not diminished. Doré has now begun to illustrate different works with a rapidity bordering on the marvelous.

Doré has already drawn more than twenty thousand illustrations. Such power of work alone is sufficient to excite admiration. This productive author can scarcely write quicker than Doré sketches his illustrations. His appearance is very attractive. He looks like a youth of twenty-four, with bright, happy eyes, a genial countenance, and a full beard. He possesses unusual strength of body, which is doubtless to be traced to his great fondness for gymnastic exercises, and to his temperate mode of life in social talents. He talks well; he sings admirably; he plays the violin, if not perhaps with professional skill, yet with great understanding; and he is a clever conjuror, rarely failing in a trick. He possesses a wonderful capacity for work. His imagination blindly obeys his iron will, which is deterred by no difficulties. When the wish occurred to him to learn English he took an English grammar and dictionary to bed with him every night, and in a few months he read the Times, and could make himself intelligible to every Englishman. At this moment he is engaged in a series of paintings, in which he is representing some of Shakspeare's most powerful scenes.

A witness in court who had been cautioned to give particular attention to every question and to talk slowly, what he might think the question meant, was interrogated as follows:

"You drive a wagon?"

"No, Sir; I don't."

"Why, man, did you not tell my learned friend on the moment?"

"No, Sir, I did not."

"Now, Sir, I put it to you on your oath, do you not drive a wagon?"

"No, Sir."

"What is your occupation, then?"

"I drive a horse, Sir."

"CUSS FOR LUCK."—Take of spirits of resolution, 14 ounces; syrup of good advice, 12 ounces: oil of absence, 2 ounces; powder of disdain, 4 ounces; extract of devil's coach-horse, 1 ounce; mix well. Add a few ingredients into a sauce-pan of sound sense, and a handful of hot words; stir well up with a quantity of thyme, and strain it through a box of patience. A small portion of the mixture to be taken daily.

Second remedy.—Set your sweet-heart before breakfast three times running, and propose.

"Ma, if I should die and go to heaven should I wear my moire-antique dress?"

"Ah, my son, we can scarcely suppose we shall wear the attire of this world in the next."

"Well, then, how in the world the angels would know I belonged to the best society?"

Two preachers were on the same platform. One of them was a Methodist, happened to say: "When Abraham built the ark—" The other, who was behind him, pulled his coat-tail, and whispered "Brother, him wasn't there." But the speaker plodded on, and repeated the remark correctly in regard to Noah. Recollecting?—I say, when Abraham built the ark—" Another pull: "I say, brother, him wasn't there!" The preacher was not to be put down in that way, so he went on the principle of an excursion train: "I guess so." I say, Abraham was there, or thereabouts!"

"I am afraid you have settled melancholy," said a lady to a cadaverous lodger. "Yes, madam," he replied; "my melancholy won't settle; like your coffee, it has too much grounds."

PROMPT REPLY.—Why did Adam bite the apple?" said a schoolmaster to a country lad.—" Because he was no knife," said the urchin.

"Hiram," said an Eastern farmer to his hired man, who was working in the field, "it looks as if it might rain. Spose you leave off work, and go play the cellar."

"Is a man and his wife both one?" asked the wife of a distinguished lawyer, in a state of stupefaction as she was holding his aching head in both her hands.

"I am inclined to think so," was the reply.

"Well, then," she said, "I came home drunk last night, and you have been asleep all day."

This back-handed rebuke from a long-suffering and shrewd wife effectually cured him of his convivial propensities.

The young man who offered for publication a poem commencing with the following stanzas should be informed that he renders himself liable to prosecution for illegal distillation:

"Oh, come, dearest, come, for love's nectarine wine
Bubbles up from my soul to overflow into thine,
And no succulent grape which the Rhine sephyrs kiss
Can produce juice of such delicate bliss.

"Then fly, and your passionate soul shall be filled
With this delicate juice from my spirit distilled;
You can drink till the stars fall from the sky,
Till you reel with delight! Oh! then—fly to me—fly!"

"FUN OR MISCHIEF"

WE reproduce on this page one of J. SANT's contributions to the exhibition of works of Art at Leeds, England. The original is painted with that freedom of style and power of rendering character for which MR. SANT is celebrated, and the engravers have done full justice to the artist's work. It is the face, full of fun or frolic, of one of those merry, lovely children with whom the world is so plentifully blest, and the arch expression of the lovely features form a most pleasant study.

THE "HENRY TROWBRIDGE."

THE wrecking of the bark Henry Trowbridge, on August 5, off Neversink is at once one of the most singular and disastrous of marine casualties which we have lately been called upon to relate and illustrate.

The vessel left New York on August 4 with a crew of 10 seamen and officers, and under command of Captain P. HOTCHKISS. The wife and two children of the Captain were aboard. The freight consisted of fifty horses, forty sheep, twenty-four mules, and the rest of staves, all consigned to Barbadoes.

On the 5th instant, when off Neversink, hardly well out of New York Bay, the bark shipped a heavy sea, which shifted the deck load, causing the vessel to careen and become not only unmanageable, but completely at the mercy of the heavy sea which was rolling at the time. Her foremast was snapped off about five feet above the deck, and every thing movable seemed to have been washed overboard. Four of the seamen were in the hold at the time, and were instantly drowned; one while lying in his bunk, another while sitting on his trunk, and in these positions their bodies were found when the water was pumped out of the hold.

Captain HOTCHKISS, wife and children, the mates, cook, and two seamen were on deck at the time of the squall, and succeeded in launching a boat, but one of the children of the Captain was unfortunately lost in the transfer to the boat. The others outrode the gale in the frail boat, being blown out to sea, but eventually reaching Halifax in safety.

The wreck was found on the 6th instant by the pilot boat Nettle, and towed into this port. Our artist has sketched the wreck as it appeared drifting at sea when discovered by the pilot-boat. Since it was moored in the East River it has been visited by thousands of curious persons.

"FUN OR MISCHIEF"—[FROM THE PAINTING BY J. SANT.]

THE SING SING CAMP-MEETING.

ONE of the largest camp-meetings ever held by the Methodists in this country was that at Sing Sing, closing on Thursday, August 13, after a week's session. The grove in which the meeting was held is situated on the summit of a lofty hill about a mile and a half from the railroad. The approach to this eminence by the pedestrian is strikingly typical of BUNYAN'S "Pilgrim's Progress"—at least so far as its difficulties are concerned, being very steep and rough, and abounding in pitfalls. From the summit a beautiful prospect is afforded of the surrounding country.

Here, upon this romantic Zion, were seating accommodations for 3000 people, but on some days the attendance was over 5000. It is said that every Methodist church in New York, and nearly every one in Brooklyn, besides a host of others, were represented in this vast audience. Surrounding the circular open space in which religious services were held were nearly 400 tents for the accommodation of those who remained permanently on the ground. A squad of the Metropolitan Police was at hand, and good order was preserved throughout the session. The steamers and railway trains were crowded daily, and at the depôt and wharf one would have almost thought himself in New York city, so great was the crowd and so numerous and persistent the hackmen.

The characteristic features of this religious gathering have been admirably seized by our artist in his illustration which we publish on another page. It is a picture which invites study.

Among the reverend gentlemen present we may mention Mr. KIRK, of Brooklyn, who preached the opening sermon; Mr. HEDSTROM, of the Bethel ship; Mr. C. D. FOSS, J. S. INSKIP, J. M'ALLISTER, and D. S. BROWN, of New York; W. H. BOOLE, of Brooklyn, and Dr. BOWMAN, of South Carolina. Mr. VINCENT SHEATHER, the well-known and eloquent member of the New York Bar, took a very active part in the religious exercises.

The final day of the session was the most interesting. In the morning the Agape, or Love Feast, was celebrated. Within this the space of an hour and a half 381 persons spoke, each one for the most part confining himself to the quotation of some appropriate text of Scripture, or of some stanza from the Methodist hymn-book. A woman aged 82, who had been converted during the session, spoke with considerable fluency, and very effectively. One of the most interesting features of the day was Dr. BOWMAN'S address. He was much affected, and was moved even more to tears when he spoke of leaving his Northern brethren. The Rev. Mr. INSKIP turned around and took the Doctor in his arms, embracing him with fervor. The audience was much moved; some wept, and many said, "That's the sort of reconstruction we want." It shows how these gatherings conduce to the growth of Christian charity. This charity overlays even sectional differences. The Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, Jun., and HENRY WARD BEECHER—the one an Episcopalian and the other a Congregationalist—were both invited to deliver discourses, though neither was able to do so on account of accidental circumstances.

The camp-meeting has ceased to be a novelty in this country, and the prejudices once existing against it are rapidly passing. It was originally the outgrowth of our primitive Western life. When churches were few and far between, the religious service in a grove satisfied the spiritual necessities of an immense number of people. These camp-meetings were, and still continue to be, a rivalling pleasure, which they counteract, as we have shown, to the cultivation of the widest Christian charity and fellowship. They have called forth some of the finest displays of oratorical power. The great Methodist preachers — the M'GEES, BASCOM, FISK, OLIN, DURBIN, and others—have found an arena for their most splendid display of pulpit oratory, and have produced the most wondrous effects upon their hearers.

In the South, the negroes have always been a prominent element in camp-meetings. It is true, their tents were behind the speaker's desk, and his back was turned toward them; but after the white people had had their preach, then the negroes had their own preaching, and a most enthusiastic affair it was, too. "Gathered in a camp-meeting," says a writer in the Weekly for August 10, 1867, "about one or two hundred, keeping time to the song with hands and feet, and swaying their bodies, not ungracefully, in unison with its strains, they would make the woods fairly ring again. Their rich voices seemed never to wear out; through the afternoons, and far into the night, their melodious singing would float above all other sounds." The time has come when the preacher can face the people; his vote will stand him in good stead even in camp-meeting. But he will never display more religious fervor than in those old times when he was a slave.

These camp-meetings, wherever held, in the West, South, or North, with their fluctuating audiences, numbering sometimes in the course of a long session upward of half a million of people, are a striking illustration of American life—characteristic at once of its freedom and its spiritual vitality.

The Body Renewed.
According to Physiologists, the human body is renewed once in seven years. Every day, every hour, every moment, the flesh, the cartilage, bone and muscle of the frame, are wearing away, and are being perpetually replaced by new material. Health depends upon the nature of that material, and whether it shall be pure or diseased, full of vitality and elasticity, or feeble and flaccid, depends upon the purity of the blood in the stomach. In warm weather the waste of the system is very rapid, and if it is not as rapidly repaired by the great sustaining organ, the consequence is debility, emaciation, and decay. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that the stomach be kept in a vigorous condition at this trying season, and the safest, surest, and best tonic that can be employed for that purpose is

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.

This incomparable vegetable stomachic gives unwonted energy to the digestive powers, promotes the conversion of food into healthy chyle, which, when rich is, so to speak, the raw material of all the solid portions of the body, and thereby puts the system in the best possible state of defense against epidemic and other diseases. The strong require it to keep up their vigor; the weak, to strengthen them. It also consists of the purest of all diffusive stimulants, charged with the juices and extracts of the most genial roots and herbs, and is a permanent restorative—not a mere temporary excitant. It acts simultaneously upon the stomach, liver, kidneys, and bowels, which is, so known remedy for dyspepsia, biliousness, costiveness, and general debility.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:
THE MOONSTONE.
A Novel.
By WILKIE COLLINS,
AUTHOR OF "ARMADALE," "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "NO NAME," "ANTONINA," "QUEEN OF HEARTS," ETC., ETC.
WITH MANY ILLUSTRATIONS.
8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

* * * The carefully-elaborate workmanship, and the wonderful construction of the story; the admirable manner in which every circumstance and incident is fitted together, and the skill with which the secret is kept to the last; so that, when all seems to have been discovered, there is a final light thrown upon people and things which give them a significance they had not before.—London Athenæum.
The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are apt to be lost sight of in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought endless ingenuity and labor. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Leader.

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show:

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 38c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money Order, as they will save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.*

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no circulars or price-lists for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by ordering direct to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIODE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIODE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. They are now acknowledged by those who have used them equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. For gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oriode Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $8. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oriode Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oriode Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oriode; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oriode Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

Oroide Jewelry.

We are now manufacturing ORIODE JEWELRY, of the latest and most approved styles. No gold jewelry, however high the price, surpasses this in beauty and elegance of workmanship, durability, and in every respect excepting intrinsic value, it equals that of fine gold which costs nearly ten times as much.

Ladies' Sets of Fine and Ear-rings $3 00 to $10; Ladies' Sets of Pins, Ear-rings, and Sleeve-Buttons, from $5 to $18; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Sleeve-Buttons, $1 50 to $5 50. Every other kind of jewelry in the same proportion. All orders in sums of less than $5 must be accompanied with a post-office Order for the amount (send no money in letters), and the goods will be sent by mail free of expense to the purchaser. Orders for $5 or more will be sent by express, to be paid for on delivery, purchaser paying express charges.

ROOT'S WROUGHT-IRON SECTIONAL

SAFETY BOILER.

POSITIVE SAFETY from EXPLOSION. HIGHEST ECONOMY of FUEL.

(From the New York Independent, April 30th, 1868.)

STEAM CIVILIZED.

A recklessness of human life is the essence of barbarism. The command, "Thou shalt not kill," limiting the power of parents, husbands, and masters, was a first step toward the civilization of the race. War is thoroughly barbaric, because it is even worse than reckless of human life. Not a few remains of barbarism linger even in our years of peace, and hide in dark corners from the light of our civilization. The locomotive on the Erie Railway was barbarous, if it was, as is charged, the result of negligence on the part of those whose duty it was to provide safe rails on which their patrons must ride. Every steam-boiler explosion is a relic of barbarism, if the owners have not done all within their power to secure safe as well as cheap machinery. The immense number of persons whose lives are endangered in mills, manufactories, and steamboats, and on all the sidewalks of down-town streets, renders it a prime duty to secure the safest kind of boilers and the best qualified engineers.

Mr. Joes B. Root has long been most favorably known for his valuable improvements on the steam engine; but his improved steam-generator promises to civilize the hasty and dangerous savage which we call steam. The name given to this invention is ROOT'S WROUGHT-IRON SECTIONAL SAFETY BOILER.

The prominent difference in plan of construction between this Boiler and the ordinary forms is, that it has no large shell to contain the water and steam. To avoid the waste of fuel in trying to force heat through thick plates of iron, this shell is always made too thin to bear high pressures. The evidence of this is, that in the shell that always explodes. This Boiler is built up entirely of the best Wrought-Iron Boiler Tubes, four (4) inches in diameter, and the water and steam are contained in them instead of being around them, as in the common Boiler. The fire and heat surround instead of passing through them. All these Tubes are tested to 600 pounds per square inch, and we are told will sustain two or three times this pressure without giving way. We are assured that Tubes never explode, as is the case with boiler shells, but are ripped at the weld, or weakest part, and that the results are incomparable compared with explosions of shells. The above test would burst most common Boilers.

These Tubes are in each Boiler all of equal length, are laid up, with spaces between them, with the heads resting upon each other, and on an inclination. These heads are of iron, square, and are screwed upon both ends of the Tubes. They have two openings in each, and the Tubes are all connected by Return Bends covering these openings, and held in place by bolts and clamps. The joints are all tight, and all on the outside. There are no joints exposed to the severe action of the fire. The bolts fasten the ends of the Boiler, and the sides are inclosed in brick walls, thus forming a large combustion chamber filled with a cluster of Tubes. The gases escape slow and gradually, consequently there is time for the heat to be taken up in small tubes or flues with rapid draft through them.

The water is supplied on a cross-pipe in the lower rear corner, and steam taken to the engine at the front top corner.

Considering how few corporations have souls, and how many yet remain barbaric, it is fortunate that this new Boiler thus combines economy of fuel with economy of life and limb. The ordinary Tubular Boiler is more economical than the Flue or Cylinder, because it has a large proportion of its surface of tubes or thin iron, but this is all tube surface, and yet far stronger than the ordinary forms.

But another advantage deserves special notice. That is the ease that it can be taken completely to pieces, and the parts carried through any common door. There is no need to tear down walls in order to admit an immense structure of boiler shells. Accordingly, it has been selected for steamers, because the tug it and to be conveyed in sections on the backs of mules, and set up in other places where it would be difficult to introduce any other boiler.

The prices are reasonable, and it costs less to erect it. It is wonderfully accessible for examination, cleaning, and renewal, and can be cheaply enlarged by adding Tubes on top of any size. Parts can be renewed or replaced without disgusting the rest of the Boiler. Finally, we believe it to be in every respect the most desirable Steam Boiler yet introduced. Its large sale to discriminating purchasers is good evidence of its possessing the valuable qualities claimed for it.

The inventor is extensively manufacturing this economical and humanitarian Boiler, and is receiving orders for it from every direction.

May the time soon be reached when steam explosions shall be no longer possible, or cease to be dangerous, and then we may begin to hope that the millennium of steamboat travelers shall anticipate but a little while the millennium of railway tourists, who shall not only die day by day without accident, but without greed of railroad managers, who are unwilling to expend a dollar to make a track safe or a car inconvertible.

"THE PET CALF."

We give on the preceding page one of the most pleasing of the works of art exhibited at the Leeds (England) Gallery, and one which we are sure will appeal to the sense and taste of all our friends in the country. "The Pet Calf" of Mr. ANSDELL, the artist, is an admirable representation of an incident which we have all seen at some farmstead—a young heifer, shy and timid, half afraid yet half inclined to make a friend of the patient humankind, with bright, sparkling eyes and pleasant smile, who coaxes the wild little creature to follow her, and who has already no doubt given it its meal of milk from the can.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1868.

A "SOLEMN KEY."

WE have received the following note from Dayton, Ohio:

"The Cincinnati Commercial has a report of the speech of Hon. B. W. WOODMAN at Terre Haute, Indiana, in which he says of Mr. SEYMOUR: 'He saved the army of the Union at Gettysburg, and for it received the personal thanks of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and EDWIN M. STANTON.' This recorded fact is the solemn key to his whole conduct during the war.' How true the above is the press can inform. A DAYTONIAN."

Mr. SEYMOUR was exactly as loyal and faithful a Union man as Mr. VOORHEES. They were both what was significantly called Copperheads; and nothing is more amusing than the attempt of those who denounced the war as fratricidal and infamous to prove that their candidate, Mr. SEYMOUR, supported it. The facts are becoming very familiar, but it is useful to consider them.

Mr. SEYMOUR was always an apologist for slavery and a defender of the policy of the slaveholders. When they seceded because of the result of the election of 1860, in which they took part, Mr. SEYMOUR assailed the party which had elected Mr. LINCOLN as responsible because it had not yielded to the threats of the slaveholders and permitted their policy to prevail. And he stated in the form of a question that "successful coercion by the North is as less revolutionary than successful secession by the South." This was a repetition of BUCHANAN'S doctrine, supplied by JEFFERSON DAVIS, that the Government could not rightfully "coerce" a State. Mr. SEYMOUR'S whole influence was directed to secure a compromise with rebels; but the loyal people insisted that the rebellion should be suppressed at every cost; and when the rebels began the war they did not shrink.

On the 28th of October, 1861, Mr. SEYMOUR made a speech which was a virtual justification of the rebellion and condemnation of the Government, and in which he said that the rebels should be sacrificed rather than slavery. In September, 1862, President LINCOLN issued his preparatory proclamation of emancipation. There were signs of a reaction of public sentiment against the war; and recalling his words of the year before, and the fact that he had never spoken one word of encouragement to the soldiers or of sympathy with the Government, the Democratic party nominated Mr. SEYMOUR for Governor. At least seventy-five thousand voters were absent from the polls in the field, of whom a vast majority were opposed to him. But notwithstanding this advantage, his managers were afraid of trusting him upon a platform of unconditional submission to rebellion, and Judge STRYKER and others persuaded him to make a speech at Brooklyn, which was the same kind of a speech that RICHARD O'GORMAN made in the great Union Square meeting after the firing upon Sumter.

Mr. SEYMOUR was elected Governor, by the vote of the city of New York, over General WADSWORTH, who had a majority of the votes in the rest of the State. It was the hope and expectation of his party that he would embarrass the national authorities by his official action, and his appointment of JOHN A. GREEN, one of the most notorious Copperheads, to high military position in the State, greatly encouraged the peace faction. But the work that was logically and naturally expected of Mr. SEYMOUR was nothing less than a counter-revolution. His message in January, 1863, showed the willing spirit, but the flesh was weak. Instead of recalling the New York regiments, or taking some decisive step of open hostility, Governor SEYMOUR chose the safer path of destroying confidence in the Government, and thereby paralyzing the national arm.

The dark summer of 1863 found LEE marching into Pennsylvania. On the 15th of June, Secretary STANTON asked authority of Governor SEYMOUR "to repel this invasion" of the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. The Governor sent the troops. On the 27th of June Secretary STANTON thanked him for his "energy, activity, and patriotism," and President LINCOLN also thanked him. The latter further told him, through Mr. THURLOW WEED, that if he would use all his power to crush the rebellion, no faithful people would make him President. Mr. WEED, in recording this fact, adds: "I gave the message of an enlightened and patriotic President to a metaphysically-muddled Governor, whose Secession and Copperhead proclivities and associations brought deserved reproach and destruction upon himself and his party." The simple truth is, that when the demand of the Government for troops was finishing a bitter commentary upon the "patriotism" that Secretary STANTON mentioned, The Secretary's note was received by Governor SEYMOUR. On the 4th of July, when the event of the great battle, for which the New York troops had been summoned, was yet unknown—when it was the instinct of every loyal and patriotic person to cheer public confidence, and encourage the soldiers in the field, Governor SEYMOUR came to the city of New York to make a speech. Not only was the moment a critical one, but during the war from the actual military situation, but because the draft had been found indispensable. This was the measure of all others against which excited the most serious and threatening hostility that was manifested during the war. Should the draft be forcibly resisted, there seemed to be no escape from a universal convulsion.

The city of New York was full of the bitter enemies of the Government and its measures. Most of the troops which had been sent away by the Governor upon the requisition of the national authorities. There were but a few New York regiments left for the protection of the city. New York was, in fact, without a military force in any extremity; and of this fact, and of the feeling and character of a vast part of the population, Governor SEYMOUR was especially aware. Deep gloom among the loyal, anger and angry hate among the disloyal, was the disposition of the public mind. This was the time and this the occasion for Governor's speech. Imagine what a man would have said to whom the cause and the country were dear. Remember what thoroughly loyal citizens every where in the country felt that day! Imagine what Governor JOHN A. ANDREW of Massachusetts would have said in such an hour and under such circumstances! His words would have been inspirations of hope, and faith, and lofty cheer. All good men, whose hearts and prayers were with GRANT and his men at Vicksburg with MEADE and at Gettysburg, would have felt, as they listened, that whatever the issue of the battle, the cause, while such leaders as ANDREW remained, was unconquerable.

Governor SEYMOUR'S speech was a taunt and a sneer. As if to make abject repentance for sending the soldiers he had no a word of bitter derision. We were promised victories for to-day, said he, and instead of them comes the midnight cry of help from Pennsylvania. He proceeded to paint the danger as hugely as he could, and, alluding to the draft, warned the Government that the bloody decree of public necessity could be performed by a mob as well as by a Government. The mob heard and applauded. It knew that the soldiers were absent, and that the police were few, however brave. It knew that the sympathy of the Governor, and it made ready. Having sown the seed on the 4th of July, the Governor, on the 13th, went out of the State into New Jersey, and on the 13th the next day. On the 14th the Governor returned and addressed the rioters dripping with innocent blood, saying to them, "I understand from you that I am your friend;" and adding, that, "as a test of my friendship," he had sent to Washington his request that the draft suspended and stopped." On Thursday night the draft and United States troops began to arrive, and the riots were suppressed. On the 3d of August the Governor wrote to the President urging the suspension of the draft, saying, threateningly, as I suggest another mob, "the temper of the people to-day you can readily learn."

HORATIO SEYMOUR bitterly denounced the war; palliated the rebellion; denied the right of the Government to "coerce States;" discouraged enlistments; pronounced for slavery rather than union; sneered at the "promised" victories; instigated the riots; threateningly urged the suspension of the draft; presided over the Chicago Convention that called the war a failure, and demanded submission of the Government, and by his whole conduct so satisfied the rebels and the Copperheads that they prayed for his success when again a candidate for Governor in 1864, and they have made him their candidate for President in 1868. On the other hand, when LEE invaded Pennsylvania in 1863, and the national authorities asked aid to repel him, Governor SEYMOUR sent the State regiments and was thanked. Whether this is saving the army at Gettysburg, and as "the solemn key" to his conduct during the war, our correspondent may now decide. Whether it is the story of a loyal American citizen the country has long ago decided.

THE STARS AND BARS AT THE DEMOCRATIC PEAK.

The spirit and method of the Democratic party in this election can not be too constantly observed. Their orators can not restrain their threats. As in 1860 they said that "the South" could not be expected to acquiesce in a defeat at the polls, so now their speeches are in the same tone. WADE HAMPTON, the chief Southern Democratic leader, in his first speech after the nominations, said, that SEYMOUR and BLAIR in a certain contingency must be placed in the White House at the point of the bayonet.

The large and the small cry in chorus. Captain RANDOLPH announces that,

"If fraud should be attempted he would be one of the multitude who would literally take up arms against the tyrant, and with the bullet regain what had been lost unfairly by the ballot."

HOWELL COBB said the other day at Atlanta, quoting from the Democratic platform,

"The Democratic party are null and void and shall not stand.... The grinning skeletons which have been set up in our midst as legislators shall be ousted by FRANK BLAIR, whom our party has expressly appointed for that purpose."

JOHN FORSYTH, one of the most blatant rebels, says in the Mobile Register, speaking of the reconstruction acts:

"We may as well say that the people of the South do not intend to submit to that government now, result as the Presidential election may. And they have only submitted to its indignities and insults so far because they hoped to obtain for the good sense and justice of the American people to relieve them from it, and restore to them to their civil rights in the November election."

The Meridian Mercury in Mississippi says:

"We must make the negro understand we are the men we were before the war, and let him adjust himself and make him feel that when forbearance ceases to be a virtue it has invoked a power that will control him or destroy him."

WADE HAMPTON, in a speech in Charleston, says:

"Arose among yourselves, and act firmly on this agreement, that you will not employ any one who votes the Radical ticket. Use all the means that are in your hands to control this element."

The Democratic clubs are following HAMPTON'S advice. One in Columbia recently resolved:

"That no member of the club shall employ, rent lands to, or patronize any Radical, after the present contracts have expired, and that from this date we will not give any employment to any freedmen who are struggling over the country as day-laborers who can not rent lands, until they are members of some Democratic association."

The Republican Banner, a Democratic organ at Nashville, announces that in a conflict of races:

"So far as the white native citizens of the State may be compelled to take part in it they will be very careful throughout the sanguinary carnival which would naturally cease to remember Fort Pillow in act as well as word.

"Throughout the bloody conflict

Send the word, 'Give no quarter to the black.'"

The hero of the massacre at Fort Pillow, and a delegate to the Democratic Convention, General FORREST, said at a recent meeting of rebel officers in Memphis, speaking of the militia bill of that State:

"Troops would be called out. They would be backed by the Federal forces. President JOHNSON, notwithstanding all the efforts he had done to gratify his pride in the National Convention, had gone back upon the Democracy. He did not look for any help from him; but it mattered not how many were arrayed against him and his old comrades.... He would treat his hero. He never thought that troops would answer as they had always done. He bade them arm themselves, and he would go. They were already drilled, and needed no drilling.... He should be in favor of giving any quarter!"

Undoubtedly; and General FORREST was of the same opinion at Fort Pillow.

Mr. GREEN CLAY SMITH, Governor of Montana, in a letter to both SEYMOUR and BLAIR in Washington, remarked;

"Virginia, as well as all the Southern States, is entitled to the same privileges as before the rebellion. She was conquered by the sword, and is still the State of Virginia, and her electoral vote must be counted. Should it be fair play, I know it would be accepted by this Radical party, and the Democrats would say Amen. Should it be cast for SEYMOUR and BLAIR, by the Eternal it shall be counted."

The new organ of the Democratic party in New York, the Democrat, says:

"It will persistently and unflinchingly advocate the equality of States or another war."

General BATTLE, of the rebel army, advocates SEYMOUR and BLAIR at Mobile in a strain of which this is the concluding paragraph:

"The Democratic party....Indorses principles for which you battled....Not only does it declare in favor of that constitution as dear to you," etc., etc.

The Vicksburg Times says:

"It was the identical letter of FRANK BLAIR to his friend, Colonel BRODHEAD, that secured the Missouri hero the nomination for Vice-President. We want just such ammunition as FRANK BLAIR."

ALBERT PIKE, strenuous for SEYMOUR and BLAIR, exclaims, in the Memphis Appeal:

"The South is our land; the North is a foreign and hostile realm.... The day will come when the South will be independent."

Mr. RAMSEY, a Democratic orator in Georgia, says:

"We are in the midst of a great revolution which may end peaceably at the ballot-box; but if not, then the true men of the South will rally once more around their now folded banner, and will try the issue at the cartridge-box.....There are men in the North who are now truly with you, and who will be such a conflict, if necessary, lead your battalions."

The Petersburg Index declares that

"Virginians are not to be frightened. Virginia has an unquestionable right to vote, and Virginia will vote.....To the counting of our votes the National Democracy solemnly pledged."

Mr. WILLIAMSON, in a speech at Shreveport, Louisiana, says:

"Let no man leave his native State. Let us lay our bones in Louisiana: and if these scalawags and carpet-baggers remain, let's hand them from the country."

These are illustrations merely of the words and the spirit of the party which calls itself conservative and professes a peculiar veneration for the Constitution. It agrees with RATHER SEMMES, the pirate of the Alabama, who declares that he gives his allegiance, heart and hand, to the ticket of SEYMOUR and BLAIR are elected. The old flag, undoubtedly; but the flag of stars and bars, not of stars and stripes. Does the country believe that such a spirit and such men will secure peace and prosperity?

THE PLATFORM OF CIVIL WAR.

SEVERAL of the States lately in rebellion have, under the direction of Congress, framed Constitutions, and have elected Senators and Representatives who have been "admitted to the councils of the Union."

The Democratic party declares that the action of Congress and of the States upon the subject is unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void. The Committee that reported the declaration also pledged themselves to carry it out to the end. The Convention that adopted it nominated for the Chief Executive a man of opinion that the President ought to subvert by force the organization established by that action. The supporters of the Convention and its candidates declare that they will not determine whether those State organizations are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void. If they succeed they claim that the existing governments are invalid, and must fall.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has also expressed itself upon this subject, and in the most peremptory and conclusive manner. In the famous DORR case, in Rhode Island, where the question was which of two claimants is the lawful government of the State, Chief-Justice TANEY delivered the opinion of the Court, as follows: "Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted to the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding upon every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."

This is the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court. Of course, therefore, when a State government has been recognized by Congress, its Constitution can be changed only according to the provisions of that instrument. It is consequently impossible to distribute the present State organization of South Carolina, for instance, or of Alabama in any other way. When, therefore, General BATTLE and the Democratic party insist that it shall be done by the direct command of the President to the army, it means that Supreme Power which says that the President is bound in this matter by the action of Congress, and it appeals openly to revolution.

The Democratic papers which before the meeting of the New York Convention admitted this, which said that a change in the new State organizations could be made only by action under "even if we elect a President," and which added, "and as to proclaiming a vain purpose to do it, we do not see how that is to help us, either in the South or the North, the vote needed to make the Democratic party a majority," have now been driven by the party whip into the revolutionary attitude. They said then:

"When the Democratic party comes into power negro suffrage will be the existing rule in the Southern States; a rule which can no more be rightfully abrogated by Federal authority than it was rightfully introduced by Federal authority." They now say the election is to determine whether that regulation shall stand or be overthrown by Federal authority. They hoped that their campaign would be conducted upon lawful, constitutional grounds. They find that it is defiantly waged upon an issue of open revolution, and they acquiesce.

HARVEST PROSPECTS ABROAD AND AT HOME.

ALL the circumstances connected with the drought in Great Britain and Ireland will be deliberately weighed, as it is one of those remarkable occasions which leave a deep impress upon the condition of the people. It affects immediately the comfort, health, and prosperity of the whole kingdom, and will be the means of transferring to those food-producing countries which possess a surplus no inconsiderable share of the profits which the English annually derive from extent of great manufacturing industry. If the United States had suffered this misfortune, we could not have borne it without an amount of distress, social and pecuniary, that would have imperilled our entire financial system. It falls upon a kingdom of immense accumulated wealth, whose fortitude and activity will be commensurate with the calamity. They will meet it without the shock that would have been occasioned here. We should be thankful to an Allwise Providence that we inhabit a land not yet so thickly populated as to be exposed to want on the score of food, and that we look to the results of harvests in other countries only to know to what part of the world we shall send the large surplus of our agricultural industry. Centuries must pass before this power shall be exhausted. The advantage of our rich lands—the only unfailing capital—we seem scarcely to know until the sufferings of those people are spread before us who, having ever an insufficient supply of food from their own tillage, are compelled to watch with intense interest the harvests and the granaries of all other countries. England nearly half a century ago awoke to the fact that her population had become too redundant to feed without importing grain. In 1815 her importations of food for home consumption were worth in value to over a quarter of a million of dollars. They now numbered now at between four and five hundred millions in our currency—and in estimating the unusual want which this year's drought will occasion. What value the English will be obliged to import to make up for their present deficiency in the next few months between their present and the next harvest is not estimated in the British press, but how they will meet the deficiency is the absorbing theme of discussion in England. An unusual number of their agents is now scattered over the world to obtain supplies at the cheapest rates, so that the burden of the drought may not be too oppressive. The opinion is universally expressed in their newspapers that, owing to the extent of their wheat crop, the price must fall; but occasionally the power of foreign countries to fix it is admitted, as in the comprehensive article in the London Saturday Review of the 1st of August. "Foreign supplies will be necessary in the most favorable years, and the extent and availability of those supplies have always a most important influence upon prices. Prima facie, with a good crop at home, prices should go down, but that would not be the case unless we can be assured of abundant imports. Our interests as those of foreign consumers is therefore only second to that which we have in our own." . . . . "The world's granaries are now empty, and there is but little on the way from foreign parts." This is what we have contended for, that the price of grain at Liverpool this year will be determined more by the cost of her importation by the home supply.

The situation in England we understand to be this. An unusual breadth of land has been sown in wheat, and the advantage has been enjoyed of gathering it without the damage from rains. It is assumed there, quite universally, that the crop is not only the largest, but the best ever harvested. Mr. Mechi, the celebrated agriculturist, states that this is so, and gives the quantity per acre and the weight of his own production as sustain the position; but whether or his lands were irrigated or not from a stream which he says has flowed with sufficient abundance through his farm does not appear. Mr. Lawes, the agricultural correspondent of the London Times, donbts if the general estimate by the community is accurate, as it would show that wheat would come to perfect maturity without the benefit of rains in the growing months. These it wanted in April, May, June, and July, and he refers the abundance of the crop during a previous season of drought to the advantage of copious rains in June, the advantage of which of the season was dry. We suppose that when this year's crop is measured, which is possible only of a part of it, it will be found deficient per acre, both in quantity and quality, and particularly as to spring wheat. The English have a saying that drought there never breeds dearth, and another that if successful in wheat it matters not so much as to the other crops; but these were originated when the population could be fed easily by home production. Even now "in times of dearth it drained much coin out of the kingdom to furnish as with corn from foreign parts." The argument doubtless prevails, as it is assiduously published of this abundant as to affect the price of what they will obtain in other markets. The fact, however, must be the reverse of this, whether the wheat crop be large or small.

We published in December some statistics showing that 34,700,000 acres of land, of the 77,000,000 of which the United Kingdom is composed, remain uncultivated. The residue, 42,300,000 acres, is divided into lands devoted to grains, roots, clover, gardens, etc., consisting of about 20,000,000 acres, and the remainder to pasturage. The wheat lands, which are the strongest and best, consist of between 3,500,000 and 4,000,000 acres, but the disproportion between them and the whole shows that the fate of the residue is much more important to England in every season. It is upon this residue that her millions of animals are fed, that the enormous products of her dairy are raised; and it is here that the drought has fallen with most severity. Our English files show that so dry is the herbage, and so full of dried leaves the woods, that fires—consuming occasionally grain fields, stacks, barns, and houses, and running over heaths and through woods; lighted by engines, and from the careless use of matches—had opened a new source of danger. Cattle were universally suffering, and were sent to dwelling no longer on these painful details—that the destruction of pastures and green crops constitutes the chief element of loss, and will impose a necessity for imports far exceeding what would 'have arisen from the entire destruction of all the wheat alone.

The activity of Liverpool in obtaining supplies now in California—which has already loaded several vessels—in the markets of the Baltic and Black Seas, and particularly here, is due to the necessity to be met over the time which will elapse before the new crop of the world will be capable of safe transfer. In October and November, up to the close of navigation, new wheat will come from the far West; but as Indian corn of the crop of 1867 did not reach this market till February of this year, and by railroad it will be in a very good condition, the crop of 1868 is not expected to arrive much sooner than February, 1869, unless some unusual demand should. Southern markets could supply it by the Gulf route, but with danger of heating. It is the old crop of wheat and corn on which reliance in the mean time is to be placed, and as this exists in the favored quarities, the holders of it, wherever they may be, hold what will unquestionably continue to be in great demand. The City of Boston took out twenty-five barrels of potatoes, which is the second new feature of this year's trade. The want of England will be urgent for wheat and barley at least, commencing in September, October, and part of November; but on the six months' supply of food she will require immediately before the harvest of 1869 she will be able to call upon this great and ever-ready agricultural region. Our means of supply will be quite ample, while competing countries on the Baltic and Black Sea, also suffering from drought, and Spain and France, if not improved, can only be exporters of grain. Our surplus on hand and from this year's planting will all be wanted; and as our farmers and planters generally seem to sacrifice their grain, their ample rewards will be store activity on all the great interests of the country.

POLITICAL TERRORISM.

THE exhortations of the Southern Democratic leaders against the employment of all freedmen who have not certificates of Democracy, and the immense advantage which the landholding and educated classes enjoy for the purpose of coercion, necessarily have over the landless laborers who depend upon them for employment, should suggest to every good citizen the actual situation in the Southern States. It is the determination of the managers of the Democratic party to carry those States at every hazard; and to carry them at any cost. Every one that he must cherish curious views of human nature who does not see the chances of their success.

A fair appeal to the people of the United States could result in nothing but the most signal Republican triumph. But the Democratic party does not mean to have any fair appeal. Hitherto it has been considered infamous for employers to coerce in any manner the vote of their employés. If the proprietors of any great factories, for instance, in New York, should privately announce that all the hands would be dismissed who did not vote a prescribed ticket, they would be justly denounced as traitors to the most sacred principle of freedom of the ballot. If they did it publicly, they would be tried for public enemies. Yet the Democratic leaders of the Southern States are openly to the party, "Agree among yourselves, and act firmly on this belief that you will not employ any man who votes the Radical ticket." That means much more than it could mean elsewhere in the country. It means starvation. Meanwhile the Democratic clubs in those States are organizing with the avowed object by will obey their instructions with murderous fidelity.

The answer made to such remarks is, that the Republicans control the State militia. But there is no militia in the Southern States. The State governments have no arms, and the supplying of arms to them by the National authorities is forbidden. The only arms in those States are in the hands of the late rebels.

The situation of multitudes of loyal voters there is consequently this: They have no opportunity; they have a habit of dependence: they own no land, and look for employment to those who despise them as traitors, and who openly declare that wherever will not vote as they direct shall starve. Against those who will not be intimidated by this threat the employers will not hesitate to use force and every kind of coercion; the State authorities who should keep the peace have no arms; and the President to whom the sufferers may constitutionally appeal takes sides with the employers. Of course, under such circumstances there is a very plain danger that the minority of the voters in those States may not obtain the majority. On the one hand, there are armed Democratic organizations professedly engaged in coercion of the vote of the poor laborer; on the other, there is a State government to which a law of Congress refuses arms. It is the imperative duty of Congress to secure a fair election; and the situation in the Southern States seems to us a sufficient reason for a September session.

THE MASK FALLING.

THE New York World, which was the chief Democratic paper in the city of New York until the recent establishment here of the La Crosse Democrat, under the name of the Democrat, always speaks of the General of the United States Army, who compelled LEE to surrender and DAVIS to fly, with the utmost scorn and contempt. It finds immense satisfaction in calling him sometimes HIRAM or ULYSSES or SIMPSON. But always SIMPSON. Sidney Simpson Napoleon. A few weeks ago, having denounced him as "violence and scurrility" in political argument, and extolled "dignity and candor," it illustrated its meaning by this exquisitely humorous and dignified argument, wholly free from scurrility:

> Sam Ulysses he got drunk,
> Fell in the fire and kicked up a chunk,
> Rebel up a chunk and broke his shin,
> Guess that's all I'm goin' in again.

The same paper is not satisfied, however, with ridiculing upon General GRANT. Speaking of the civil administration of another eminent Union General in the Southern States—soldiers whom the Democratic party will never forgive, both for their success in suppressing the rebellion, and for their subsequent resolute defense of loyal Southern men against rebel Democrats—the World says:

"We do not follow these men into that retirement in which life is not long enough for them to linger until their memories shall be forgotten or rejoiced. They have acted their part, strutted their little hour, and they are now dismissed. We have now mere effete political courtesans, like FOOTE and STOCKTON, penniless, like BUTLER and DOWNEY, and lower still, dated pompous, like ORR; or impudent, like HOWARD, here in Washington, and MORTON and ROWAN. But as the laws were, they had a humane side which the present laws have not. We can afford to be humane in regard. Hence the suffering of the South, and hence the hope that it would soon be relieved by generals writes."

On the other hand the same paper says of a speech of WADE HAMPTON, one of the most implacable of the rebel chiefs, who supports SEYMOUR and BLAIR because he thinks their election the surest way for the "lost cause" to be recovered, that it "does honor to the American character." It says those words the true American citizen speaks." Wade HAMPTON says that the cause of "the South" is not lost, and that the present political contest involves issues more momentous than those of that which is just ended. Such words can have but one meaning: and the World, which sneers at GRANT and maligns his associates, rapturously exclaims that WADE HAMPTON "exhibits the practical temper and a just political vision which do honor to the American character."

BASE COIN.

JOHN A. GRISWOLD is unsullied and unassailable in his character for Governor of New York, except by the merest partisan recklessness. Some of the most unscrupulous of the Democratic papers have been endeavoring to tarnish his reputation in connection with Fenian monitors. If the reader, however, will remember that Mr. GRISWOLD left the Democratic party because of its attitude during the rebellion, he will perceive both a very obvious explanation of Democratic slanders, and a very cogent proposition against any unpatriotic action. But Mr. GRISWOLD'S patriotism and character are not subjects of presumption.

Mr. GRISWOLD, with C. S. BUSHNELL and J. F. WENTWORTH, contracted with the Government to build an iron-clad vessel upon ERICSON'S model. The Naval Board prescribed that there should be a guarantee and forfeiture in case of failure to construct the heaviest fire at the shortest range and only one hundred days were allowed for the work. Mr. GRISWOLD and his partners built and delivered as the advances of the Government for material and labor were insufficient. Mr. GRISWOLD supplied the balance. The vessel was finished, the stipulated price, which would have been lost had the Monitor failed in the fight with the Merrimac. So, after the contract was made for the Dictator and the Puritan, Mr. REED, the chairman of the Naval Committee in the House, moved to amend so that the Government should pay the then value of the Puritan and the material on hand necessary for her construction. Mr. GRISWOLD voted for the motion, which saved Captain ERICSSON from ruin.

This base coin of miserable slander, with which the Democratic papers assailed the campaign, representing Mr. GRISWOLD as a sly and grasping trader in national misfortunes, and General GRANT as a weak, worthless cotton thief, should be very summarily nailed to the counter.

A SENSIBLE SCHEME.

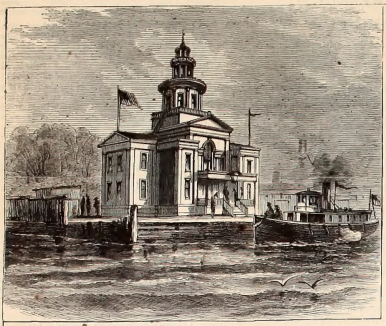
WE recommend to our readers a consideration of the Tennessee Manual Labor University, chartered by the Legislature of that State, and under the control of the colored citizens. The Board of Trustees have purchased a site of three hundred acres in Rutherford County, twenty-seven miles from Nashville, and near Murfreesborough. The object of the institution is to furnish to the indigent youth of the State an opportunity for literary, physical, and moral education. The principal feature is the instruction proposed to be given to young men and women in manual labor. The agent of this institution, who is collecting contributions in this city—Mr. DANIEL WADLEIGH—comes to us with authentic certificates from Governor BROWNLOW and other prominent citizens of Tennessee. We recommend the scheme to all philanthropists who desire to promote the interests of the freedmen in that State.

LEAD PIPE AND LEAD POISONING.

IT is beyond dispute that all the "salts" and "oxides" of lead are dangerous poisons. It is affirmed, upon the highest scientific authority, that some of these poisonous compounds are invariably produced by the contact with lead of water which contains air. The results of lead poison are well known. They take away the general forms of colic and paralysis. The quantity of lead necessary to manifest effects is very small. Every glass of even the purest water which has passed through a leaden pipe is liable to contain more or less lead. Lead, moreover, possesses the special property, that when introduced into the human system it is not readily thrown off, but remains in the body in quantities almost infinitesimally introduced, in succession, as what is called a cumulative effect. It has long been considered impossible to produce a pipe for the conveyance of water for domestic use which should be free from this serious objection. Iron pipe we meet this year, but are troublesome from rust, leaking at joints, difficulty of repairing, and their adaptation to the various indispensable situations is so difficult that they can never come into general use. Tin was next thought of, but, as usually made, is very slightly acted upon by any of the substances mentioned in water, and none of the compounds thus formed are poisonous. There were, however, many obstacles—mechanical and economical—to be surmounted in adapting this metal to that purpose. These obstacles, it is announced, have been overcome in the "Lead-Encased Block Tin Pipe" manufactured by THE COWELLS, SHAW, & WILLARD MANUFACTURING COMPANY. This consists simply of a continuous pipe of solid tin, encased with an exterior covering of lead, so that the water conveyed through it never comes in contact with the poisonous lead, but only with the innocuous tin. The manufacturers also claim that the "strength of a" leaden pipe, of large bore into consideration, can be executed as economically by the tin-encased, as by the usual lead pipe.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.



GENERAL SHERMAN has officially informed the Secretary of War that the Indian atrocities in Kansas are too horrible to detail, and that he has directed General Sheridan, who is in pursuit, to inflict summary punishment upon the perpetrators. The President and the Secretary have both acquiesced in General Sherman's instructions in the matter. GENERAL GRANT has issued an order directing the forcible removal of Indians to their reservations, and compelling them to deliver up the perpetrators of the guilty acts. All communication or friendly intercourse will be prohibited. General Sherman reports to the War Department that the Indian depredations are beyond all precedent, and the President has again signified his approval of the course.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE French people are evidently growing weary of military pageantry. At the review of the army at Metz, seldom has such a splendid display been made, and the effort to please and against war. The parades, which were the most conspicuous and the celebrations of the glory of France, have become their horror as indicative of war. The reaction which set in from Sadowa with time resulted in the defeat of the Government candidates by a large majority. Paris and other cities have been in a state of excitement, although the despot of the Emperor are not disturbed.

The war apparently over the end of the unfortunate war in Paraguay. The Brazilian Government now has at Asuncion 15,000 men. The people are clamorous for peace. Sarmiento, the newly elected President of the Argentine Confederation, is opposed to the alliance with Brazil, and there is an ominous feeling between the two countries. Nevertheless, the allies have lately been again badly repulsed before Humaita, with

THE LAWYER'S STORY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER II.

"I ASKED you to prepare a will," began my companion, after a silence of a minute or two, during which the smoke was ascending in curling rings from the bowl of his pipe, and lost itself in the darkness of the upper part of the room. But none passed from his lips, for he seemed to be too much buried in thought to permit him to smoke, and the golden mouth-piece rested motionless on his lip until he spoke:

"I made my will fifteen years ago. It lies in that cave yonder. You shall read it some day. It is perhaps as well as any new one I could prepare. But it is in favor of one who was, I then thought, in the world, and whom I should soon meet, and whom I should educate to be worthy the great estate I could give her. But I have never met her. I have never heard of her. I know not if she be alive, or whether her fair locks that I so loved once have lain in the dust for nearly a score of years. No, I am wrong. I do know that she is not dead. I said I had faith in nothing. I have in that. Though I have not seen my child in seventeen years, yet I know that she lives, and that I shall see her before I die. I know it as well as I know my own existence. I have not dreamed that. No; I have learned it, and believed it, and it is true. Somewhere within the circumference of the world I have a child, and that is all I know of her residence, and yet she is my child, my own child!

"I have searched creation for her. For five years I did nothing but hunt the world over for her, and for ten years past I have done nothing but dream over that search, except when I have started off on its renewal, and come back to dream and start again. I have sought her from Russia to the Cape of Good Hope, from Hudson Bay to Patagonia.

"You smile, but I am serious. This search is my whole life, and though for some years I have abandoned it, my faith is growing so strong that I shall yet meet her in the world that I am determined to renew it again.

"You would think me a maniac if I should relate the thousand follies I have committed in this all-engrossing pursuit. I once stopped a Russian sleigh on the route to Siberia to see if she were in it. I boarded a schooner in a gale of wind off the coast of Peru to ask for a list of her passengers. I never saw a means of conveyance or a group of persons that I did not think it possible she was there, and unless I examined and satisfied myself I would be ill despair for weeks afterward with the idea that I had missed her. Nay, I turned at every face I met, looked under every bonnet, and hurried up and down street after street of strange cities with no other object. Sometimes I forgot that I was looking for a human being, and looked as I would for a lost ring or jewel. I was asked a thousand times what I was searching after. In those labyrinthine catacombs of Egypt I was so mad as to go through every chamber, and look behind every pile of mummies, if perchance I could find some trace of her there!

"WALTER, YOU ARE THE ONLY FRIEND I HAVE ON EARTH."

"Can you understand what I mean? I was a monomaniac, insane, mad; and when I shall have told you my story you will hardly think it strange that I was mad. To have loved what I loved, to have lost what I lost, were surely enough to have maddened one more than man. Sometimes I think I am mad now. Sometimes I lie awake in the night-time, and believe that all this terrible story of my love and loss is a myth, a fancy, a dream, and that I am a young, strong, joyful man again, and I look around my room in the dim fire-light, and I call 'Eve! Eve!' and when the door does not open, and she does not come and lie down by me, I shudder, and remember what I am, and I shrink under the cover and tremble, and lie like a frightened child, lonesome, and beyond all words desolate.

"And I can not longer remain alone. I have sought you to tell my story to some one that could talk with me—to whom I could talk—that the weight of this one terrible thought on my soul may be in some measure lessened.

"I was a wild boy. My father had a respectable property, sufficient to make my allowance liberal, and the result was my ruin. Yes, ruin is the word. I was absolutely ruined. I went to college, kept fast horses, good wines, drank freely myself, and made my rooms the resort of all who loved the good things of the world. It was my pride to have brilliant scenes in my rooms, to be constantly surrounded by the gay, the laughter-loving, the free. Sometimes I studied, and I ranked at least respectably as a scholar. I delivered the farewell address to my class, which I remember was esteemed an honorable appointment. I graduated, and fancied myself a man. I was still a boy, but a boy of ardent, dreamy nature. I had no restraint of mind, no sort of discipline. The effect of the reckless life I had led for four years in college was precisely what might have been anticipated in my after-life. I did not understand any of the laws of life, and I cared nothing for them. My wish was my law. Desire was always the reason for possession. Hence, perhaps, all my suffering.

"I had never loved a woman. Rare truth! I was twenty-one, and had never known that I could love. I had looked into many pretty faces, and, if the truth were known, I had pressed my lips to many soft cheeks; nay, to many red lips, perhaps, that were not unwilling; but that was in the country where I was brought up, and no one thought all that very wrong. The year after I graduated a new era commenced with me.

"I will not stop to describe to you the exceeding beauty of Eve Gray. She was beautiful; let that suffice. I met her at my own home, and did not recognize the child I had known from childhood. She was like a vision of heaven to me, and somehow she learned to regard me very much as a girl of thirteen would regard a boy of the same age, not as a woman of nineteen, learned already in the world's ways, would look on a man of twenty-two.

"We rambled over the hills together. We sat side by side in the glen. The moonlight was no different to us from the sunshine. We made all alike, and we loved each other. She was my angel. God sent her to me, I believed, to renew my soul, to make me a new man, or a man for the first time, by making me a child again, innocent, and full of fresh, warm feeling, untutored, unfeigned. As I looked into her matchless eyes beaming with love and life, and on her feature as radiant with beauty, I blessed God and believed in Him and heaven. I could not tell you half our love. It was pure and perfect. She reverenced me and I worshiped her. Well, was that wrong? God never meant to forbid our worshiping beauty, so we only acknowledge His command over it. In worshiping His beautiful things we worship Him.

"And she was beautiful. Yes, I must tell you of her. I love to linger on that beauty now, and recall the features which my boy lips have caressed a thousand times, the brow that was so calm with thoughts of me.

"You have been in Florence. Do you remember that picture of the Virgin in Guido's room known in the catalogue of the Gallery of the Pitti Palace as 'La Sentissima Annunziata?' That calm and heavenly face in its matchless outline was hers. A thousand times I have looked from her countenance to that canvas and back at her speaking features in their serenity and sincerity, and wondered where the painter saw her, for he must have seen her, to paint one in reality.

"Her form was full and perfectly rounded; her foot was exquisitely small; her hand very beautiful for its size and action; I feared to grasp those delicate fingers in mine. There were no features of her face that attracted more attention than any other. They were her lips and her eyes. The former were chiseled with all the skill which art gives the lips of the first Eve, and they were as tempting as Adam found them then. But there was a slight and constant curl on the upper lip, a shade of contempt for all the world, a consciousness of superiority, a grade of pride that bound her to my proud heart more than aught else.

"Her eyes were of a deep blue, flashing with lustre, and they gleamed through the bars which her long lashes placed across them with a radiance which startled you. On me they never looked save lovingly, and now that so many years have passed since I last met their gaze, I thank God that that last look of hers was full of woman love! Yes, I thank God, for when I remember that look her pure faith I believe in Him! and I refuse to doubt even when I have not believe. We are boys till some great event makes men of us. We can't date the change exactly; but, when we recognize our boyhood we remember that just about the time of some terrible blow, just about the date of some overwhelming joy or sorrow, we grew suddenly thoughtful and reasonable, or, in other words, we became men. So it was with me. My mother died. To me it was terrible. I had not thought she could leave me alone; but so it was, and I was desolate in my grief. It was in that hour of agony that I learned the blessedness of God's gentle love. It was then that her presence touched me, in the still hours when I would have been blaspheming, and her hand pushed back the hair from my forehead, and her lips kissed away tears of comfort to me.

"She lived close by my father's place, and I found myself now constantly with her. I forgot every thing for her love. I gave up all my former enjoyments and employments of life for the sake of her company. We read, walked, rode, talked, dreamed together. And while I grew like her in the depth and gentleness of my love, she grew like me in the energy and determination of mine. We forgot everything else. We lived for three months in a wild dream of joy.

"It was the way it ended. Our fathers were political opponents, and in a contest of unusual closeness certain hard words were spoken by one or the other which resulted in a quarrel of no small fierceness. I did not attend to that fuss with the meetings of the two families; but when it had come down to blows in a public highway, and the binding of both parties over to keep the peace, lest a duel should ensue, it became impossible for me to observe their frank intimacy. We had still private meetings, where was a deep wood near the line of the two parks where we could meet, and we met twice a day. There we read or talked, and whiled away many a golden summer afternoon. How distinctly I now remember it! Heard now in the city mansion, surrounded by these relics of the wealth and learning and arts of the Old World, with the roar of carriages coming to us on the floor of the crowded street, and the swift tramp of multitudes hastening to the next scenes of pleasure or of pain, I remember that those days of the dead leaves lay thick all summer long, and the shrill whistle of the quail was in the air, and the sunshine scarcely stealing through the thick foliage of the trees, and the sharp chirp of the woodpecker, and the chatter of the squirrel, and the call of the crow far overhead, and the solemn sound of the wind in the tall hickory and oak trees, and the rare beauty of the wild flowers by my side and read from my book, while her hand lay on my shoulder or was pressed in mine. Why we were very children, you say, and so we were: but angels nor the sons of God ever loved with more fervor of love than we. We were full grown; we were gods in our affection!

"Our love spod bravely thus, until one morning she came to me terrified lest her father had discovered our meetings. We walked together in the river bank and planned various things in the future, which now suddenly hung like a block over our glorious prospect. Then we exchanged vows of everlasting love, and vowed to heaven, and called each other by the sacred name of husband and wife. It was no play. It was a solemn reality with us both; and no one ever went to the altar in magnificent church, or spoke the vows of marriage in the presence of a multitude, with more meaning or earnestness, or with a higher conception of the greatness of those vows, than we in the forest, on the river bank, on that summer afternoon. The wine is with you, Mr. Blackstone.

"Eve Gray was a woman. You smile. I will smile too. I tell you the whole story there. She was a woman. Well, what of that? I was a man. Each had faults belonging to the sex, and both had pride abounding. Her pride was hooked by the most unfortunate of the weakness of her sex, mine by the folly, unkindness, meanness of mine. We were living in the present. We had no future. We lived for the passing hours. A slight thing disturbed the serenity of our love. She was calm and determined, I boisterous and obstinate. I never could tell precisely what the difficulty between us was. When it was all over I tried in vain to recall the origin of the quarrel. It was some trifle. I only remember that in the progress of it much was said about my obstinate adherence to a refusal to be at a certain dinner or evening party to which she wished to meet me. Certainly it was nothing more than that; but the end was a general overhauling of all our offenses against each other, and one afternoon, in a swift tempest of passion, we parted.

"We thought the parting was for a day or a week at most. Alas for the sad uncertainty of human prophecy! We met no more for years, and that little thoughtlessness cost us dear.

"I was obliged to leave my home suddenly to attend to some business for my father in a Southern city. Eve heard of it, and left for the country, and naturally supposed that I was jettish, and she grew more angry.

"I wrote to her from Charleston. "The letter never reached her. Her father doubtless suppressed it. He made it necessary to go from that city to Europe. I was absent two years, and received only by a casual remark in a letter from my father, that Eve was married.

"I was in Florence when I heard it. The blow was terrible. I found myself, an hour, two, four hours after, sitting over the letter, standing with it in my hand before that picture of Carlo Dolci of which I have spoken, gazing at the heaven I had lost.

"I remember the time over me like a flood the memories of the grand days of love in which my years of greatest joy were dead and buried, and I seemed to be in their grave with them listening to the solemn wind that moved in the trees above them. I thundered when I awoke to perfect consciousness that I was now a new, another man. The second great change in my life had occurred, and I was a wanderer on the face of the earth, without a home forever.

"Men laugh at human love. I have sometimes laughed at it myself, but never since then. I tell you that love is the life of heaven. There was no part of it in which it did not overthrow every power of the heaven in which dwelt the memory of Eve. I tell you gold may be unknown before, remorse for the last parting that I now knew my own madness had caused.

"Year after year passed, and I wandered all over the world. Wealth I had in overflowing measures, and I sought pleasure through the world. I need not tell you that I found none. Money will buy it every where; and I laughed then, as I laugh now, at the cant which says no pleasure can be bought. I tell you gold buys all but heaven itself, and gold bought me four years of the most joys, most keen, rich pleasures that the world ever furnished. And I gave like those years I returned to my own country with a heart that had grown proof against all the beauty even of my young wife Eve. I was a man of the world. I must retrace my steps a little way in this story.

"Henry Gordon and Joseph Gordon were two sons of a family remotely related to Eve Gray. They were distantly connected by father's principles when we were at school together. We grew to call them, as you lawyers say, jointly and severally. I first whipped Joseph Gordon for impertinence, and then Joseph for interfering, and the consequence of them together for doing me to strike them. This was the beginning of a feud. It was the commencement of an enmity that has grown to more violent daily and yearly to this day, and which helped to make me what I am. I do not think that I am frankly that my own evil passions have caused all my trials.

"At length I made the enmity mortal by what I thought great fun, though it was serious in its consequences on the boys. They were bad boys enough, and were always mischief in the country. But I confess to some compunctions of conscience when they were convicted, through my instrumentality, of robbing a neighbor's peach-tree in the night of a poor woman, and were prosecuted by a village justice, my old friend and ally, to a sojourn of three days in the county jail. From that day I knew that my life was in danger hourly.

"You must understand my character in those days to be able to appreciate the effect which this enmity produced. I was accustomed to make much of all such emotions, and my mistaken father taught me that I was to live for family alliances and enmities.

"Joseph Gordon had been a suitor of Eve before I saw her after leaving college. She knew him thoroughly, and as thoroughly detested him, but as a country neighbor she was forced to be on ordinary good terms with him, especially as he had never declared himself as a lover. But when he saw the growing intimacy of Eve with me his anger was boundless. He followed us one day to the old forest, and thrust himself rudely into our company, and took the opportunity to insult me for a blow I struck. I repeated the lessons of school-days. I gave him a terrible thrashing then and there, with Eve looking on, trembling, beseeching. Yes, I verily believe, enjoying the scene when she knew I was victor. He became other than like a blood-hound in pursuit of revenge. He shot my dogs. He hired me to fight him with pistols, and I thrashed him again for the second insult. There was no method he did not pursue to annoy and persecute me. And he has had his revenge.

"Eve Gray had been the wife of Henry Gordon more than four years when I returned and had the story of her marriage. She told me all. How she had resisted entreaties, threats, and commands; how she had been deceived; and, finally, spirit-broken and ready to die, had sought peace and death rather than that immolation. And when they had driven her to despair—when they had persecuted her even to the threshold of death, she still resisted with mere human power, until, suspecting at the last her concealed enmity, and the unknown source of all her strength, they left in her way a paper in which they had caused a notice of my death to be printed, which she read and remembered no more. For weeks she was insensible or delirious, and when she awoke to reason they told her she was married, and the wife of Henry Gordon.

"That moment she was changed, fearfully changed. A wild, raving, shouting, confiding girl was suddenly transformed into a proud, reserved, but, oh, how beautiful and lovely woman! She had thought me dead, and never survive such a union, but she grew fairly splendid in the hatred of her husband, which now gave her life. Every day she learned to hate me more his vileness, and suffered more and more of his cruelty, but she never seemed to thrive under wrongs. The world knew nothing of her, though Gordon's reputation was none of the best.

"My return was like a resurrection from the dead. When she saw me, and knew that I was living, and not, as she had supposed, a shade returned from other shapes that filled her haunted past, she has often confessed to me that emotions were first and only unspeakable joy that she had in the world; a hope of aid against the brutality of the man to whom she was bound. But she hoped all things, though her life seemed lifeless.

"She loved me better than in the old time. How did I know it? I knew it by my own soul; by her soul; by her eyes; by her voice; by all that makes us human. She knew it. I met her at the gayest rout of the season. She did not know me at the first, in my dark dress and with my beard. at the first, in my dark dress and with my beard-ed face. But at the moment her she trembled, and when I spoke she nearly fainted.

"The next day I called on her. There was a child of two years, full of her beauty—her child; and the mother's love for me seemed to pass to her by inheritance, for she sprang into my arms as I stretched them to her and called me papa.' I remember now the exquisite blush which shot over the mother's face like a crimson light, changing and heightening her beauty.

"Not papa, my child, but uncle. You may call me Harry, dear.'

"I caught the delicate idea, and her look, as she raised her eyes to mine, was as plain as if she had spoken aloud, and me to be her brother. I answered with a glance. We began to converse as mere, and we were brother and sister thenceforth.

"Fatal! that cant was that!' I knew it then. I knew there was no such bond possible. Sameness of blood, of interest, of home. She or I or both of us must perish. I saw it all. I knew the end must come. Yet I plunged into the flood that swept us on. I met that same night, returning from another assembly, her carriage set us down at her door. In the dim light I clasped her close to my side, unresisting, let me press my lips to her cheek, and eyes, and lips, and soothed herself with the idea that I was her brother.

"Shall I tell you of the madness that now took possession of us? How day by day we slipped unconsciously from our honor, our religion, our salvation? It was not she that did it. It was both of us—ignorant, stupid, suicidal that we were. We knew it not. Our eyes were wide open from the first. She never doubted that she was lost when I met her in the crowd; and from that moment I regarded her destruction here and forever as sure. But beyond destruction! These hours were purchased by the sacrifice of eternity, and they were cheap at that!"

Ashton rose from his chair, and walked up and down the room in deep excitement, furiously:

"They were like goblets of wine in the cup of Dives. They were like water to the lips of the famishing. They were such in their delightful compressed more joy, more wild, exulting joy, than a thousand lifetimes ever knew, before or since.

"And the end came with speed. A year had passed in this dream. We met daily; and the days had the wings of the eagle, and flew, as you please—but they were winged gloriously.

"One evening I was startled by a furious ringing of my door-bell, and a message from Eve demanded my immediate presence. I was surprised. I had seen her but a moment of each day for a week, for her child was ill, and she had devoted all her time to it.

"I was shown to her room, and found her standing silent and motionless by the dead body of her child, with her stern eyes fixed on the face of her husband, who, with his brother, were at a little distance. I had not met Joseph Gordon since my return from Europe, but I had heard of him as a gambler and a companion of the debased of both sexes. As he saw me enter the room he sprang furiously toward me.

"'What business have you here?'

"'I have not come unwilled.'

"'You are at least not needed. Thomas, show him the door.'

"'Stop, Walter Ashmun. I sent for you, desired you to be here to-night. Walter, you are the only friend I have on earth. My father and mother are both dead. I have no living relative but one old uncle who has forgotten, if he ever knew, that I was me. You were once and dearer to me than all others. Yes, Henry Gordon, before I knew you he called me wife! Perhaps I was not his wedded wife in law. But I have been your wife, and I am so no longer. I renounce you. I will not be called by your name. I abhor you, and I will leave you.'

"'Walter, see that dead child? He has murdered her. Yes, I said the word. The poor, sick child lifted her lips with some lingering love for him, and in his drunken mood he struck her —struck the gentlest child that ever sought a father's kiss, and she lay down and died. Then he struck me. Here—look at my cheek. It tingles yet with madness. And then he went out to his drunken companions, and I sent for you.'

"Enough of this,' said Joseph Gordon, while Henry stood as if in a drunken stupor.

"'Will you leave this house, or must I put you out?'

"I was perplexed not a little. But Joseph Gordon gave me no time for reflection. He advanced and took me by the collar, and I had no hesitation in striking him a blow that loosened his grasp and nearly floored him. He seized a chair, the first weapon that came to his hand. I received the blow, closed with him, shook the life nearly out of him, and threw him out of the door and down the stairs. A double-less breaking some bones, and leaving him senseless at the foot of the staircase.

"Then I walked down, bewildered, not knowing what I did, and as I passed out into the street I felt the hand of Eve's husband on my arm.

"'I will go with you, Walter. Take me somewhere to die.'

"I was not surprised nor startled. It seemed perfectly natural. We walked along the street together to my home. We entered the door as the door of paradise to us both. We sat in this library. Yes, in this room; in that chair, yonder, and she shuddered as she buried her face in my breast, and we looked up at me with a pale but peaceful face, and the struggle was over.

"One week after that we were on the sea. You look shocked. You have not anticipated this of Eve Gray. I know it was a fearful and deadly sin. I know there is no blacker page in the record of the recording angel has written than the one which bears this story.

"But in some respects it was palliated. She had been deceived into the marriage. Perhaps it were better to say she had never been married to him, for she never remembered any such ceremony. Eve was duly performed during her delirium by a hired scoundrel and his pliant wife. She had been bitterly wronged by her husband. She was an innocent, ill-treated, outraged, in the most villainous manner. His debauchery, debasement, and abandoned character was notorious. What could she do? She had no friends in all the world but me. Her parents were dead. Her child alone was gone. You say she should have obtained a divorce before she came to me. You are right. But when love and madness are in the soul, prudence and judgment take their leave. There was no prudence and our sin. We debased our union by that deep stain. And although the error was repaired soon, yet Eve never recovered from the damning sense of her error—her first impurity of deed.

"Within a year Henry Gordon died, and Eve was free. But the purity union was never made legal and sanctified by the Church. We were married in an old church in England, and thence went to Italy, where two years later our only child was born.

"But Eve was never again the Eve of other years. She was lovely always. Her child's existence only served to cheer and comfort her. The memory of the past pressed on her with insupportable weight, and her great and sought refuge from the storms of the world where the never find certain repose.

"From time to time her mind reverted to the religious instructions of earlier years, and once, while in Florence a clergyman whom she had known in America, and he came to see us often and talked gently and pleasantly with her. He endeavored to turn the return of color to her face as the comfort of a certain faith; for future time took the place of the miserable doubts and gloom with which the present had surrounded her.

"Perhaps had she lived longer she might have saved me. Perhaps had she been left to me I, with her faith, might have been left to doubt—might have hope where now I but wander restlessly.

"My joy at her returning cheerfulness was without foundation. She was not to be with me any longer, and the gloom which still surrounds me began to settle on my soul.

"Eve was sick. A fever had seized on her, and I thought she would die. I employed all the skill of Naples, but the disease increased and hope ended with the sunset of the fourteenth night. That long, long night of agony! Morning broke dimly and gnwly in the east. I had not moved from her side for seven days. She looked up at me, raised her arms and wound them around my neck, and, with a gentle tenderly down to her and buried my head in her bosom, while she spoke hoarsely and faintly and with difficult utterance.

"Walter, do you remember my mother? I see her in a dream just now, and, Walter, I shall never see her again in dreams, never in life, but I shall see her soon, very soon, in heaven. Walter, say Christ have mercy on me. That's the first prayer your lips have uttered in years. Mother was weeping, Walter, and she pleaded toward Eve, and looked so sadly and mournfully! Oh, be careful of Eve, Walter. Guard her as you would me if I were left you. I am going now. Eve, Eve, my darling—Eve—love him—love him—Walter—Eve—Eve—Walter—Christ have mercy on us—take—care—of—Eve—Walter."

She was dead, and I was desolate.

The ceremonies of the next two years I will pass over. Perhaps it was only accident, but three times during those years I had met Joseph Gordon, and every time had a collision with him of more or less severity, and each time he avowed that he was pursuing me with a determination to be revenged, as soon as he was on my dead wife, whom his hate yet pursued beyond the grave. I became exceedingly nervous about this, and after the death of Eve I left Naples and sought concealment in Germany.

I made up my mind to lead a retired and quiet life, if I could find a place where nothing would remind me of the sorrowful past.

I loved that child with all the passionate mad love I gave my mother. I wandered with her all we reached the Rhine. We remained a week at Cologne. One evening, in the street, I met a party of English gentlemen and a number of Americans. I knew the face of one of them—it was Joseph Gordon. That night I left Cologne. I was followed. My house was attacked, I fought desperately, but was left bleeding on the deck, and Eve was gone when my senses returned.

"From that time to this I have been unable to gain any traces of my child. For several years I did nothing else search for her. You may receive how vain was such a search. She was stolen from me by a man who had no home, no residence, no friends. He was never heard of in America after that, and I only knew that my child and myself were somewhere in the broad world together. So we have never met. In my search became a monomania. I traveled the world over and over again, with the mere chance that in either some city, or some village or town I might light on a trace of her. You may imagine the effect which this one object of life had on a man of my temperament, and the beliefs it had to me to commit. But my search was vain. The Gordons have been well revenged.

"I came back to live in America. My father's fortune had, by some changes in the value of real estate near the city, become enormous. My mother's brother died and left me all his fortune. I was wealthy beyond ordinary counting, and I was miserable. Now, I confess to you, life began to be a burden. I resolved to bury myself in solitude and study. How well I have succeeded you may judge from the fact that for ten years I have lived on the in this house, and of the time in this room.

"Do not ask me what has occurred to disturb this quiet. Perhaps it was a dream, for she visits me in dreams. Perhaps it was a notion I have had that I am to die before long, and that I owe Eve a reparation. I made the choice of her child. Perhaps it is the yearning tenderness to look on my own offspring, to hear the words of a child's affection before I die out of the world in which I have been so useless, so worse than useless.

"Perhaps it is the love of adventure, of excitement, or perhaps a little of all these together. Enough that my desires are aroused. I must renew the search. I need a friend, counsel, advice, assistance. Help me. Eve is living. My heart tells me that. Though my reason may doubt it. If you will encourage me to believe she can be found I will go the earth over to find her, hold her for one moment in my arms, or if it must be I will only look one instant into her eyes (Eve's eyes!), and then go to her mother and tell her she is safe."

COLLECTING THE CUSTOMS.

THE attention of metropolitan readers has lately been attracted to the extensive practice of smuggling carried on at this port by the seizure, by the revenue officers, of a sloop belonging to the State, manned by employés of the Board of Health of this city, and on duty at the quarantine station in the lower bay. A revenue cutter, commanded by Surveyor WAKEMAN, lay down, under cover of night, to Quarantine, seized the sloop, and found on board of her several thousand cigars, which had been carried aboard in a coffin! This equals, if it does not surpass, the operations of the French and English "apostles of free trade," who carried watches in their boot-heels.

This was a startling instance of smuggling; but it was a petty affair compared with the extensive operations regularly carried on at this port.

"The facilities for smuggling," says Commissioner of Customs SARGENT in his report for June 30, 1867, the latest published, "afforded by the great extent of our frontier, and its peculiar and varied nature, are apparent to the most casual observer; but no one can fully realize them who has never traversed any our northern boundary line from Eastport, Maine, to Port Angeles, Washington Territory, a distance of from three to four thousand miles; or who has never attempted to stop blockade-running along our Southern coast. But perhaps, after all, the port of New York—a labyrinthine world of itself—affords as great, if not greater, facilities for defrauding the revenue, by evading payment of duties, as any other locality; and I have reason to believe that the most of what is done there is done on a large scale. I have reason to believe that extensive combinations have been formed by men in this country and in Europe, who have large means at command, to run foreign goods into this country without the payment of duties. Indeed these combinations have existed for some time past, and they have probably been, to a considerable extent, successful in their operations."

The extent of the smuggling can not, of course, be enumerated in figures; but some idea of its magnitude can be had by the value of some of the captured property. Mr. SARGENT estimates the captured and abandoned property of this character for the year ending June 30, 1867, at $1,699,345 73, and the value of that seized by special agents at various parts of the country at $1,268,140 40. These seizures were specially employed by Mr. SARGENT, as an experiment. Very soon the government $116,582 99, thus yielding a profit of over a million of dollars. Besides, their activity made petty smuggling by passengers nearly null large amounts were paid on goods which were formerly run through with impunity. These special agents and detectives—they are both sexes—were, under Mr. SARGENT's directions, very successful last year in ferreting out and bringing to light cases of smuggling which had been successfully accomplished one, two, and, in some instances, three years before. Among them were some large operations, in all of which dockers were compelled to disgorge not only their ill-gotten gains, but, in some cases, large sums besides. Many tradesmen learned to their cost that smuggling ed during the past fiscal year. The special agents are stimulated by the hope of pecuniary reward, namely, the share of one-fourth, allowed by the law to the informer out of fines, penalties, and forfeitures. By an old law of 1799 he who gives information against goods, persons and effeitures are made is entitled to one-fourth of the forfeiture. It is this hope of gain which induces seamen, liberties, waiters, and others living along the coast and frontier line, to give information to the officers of customs of smuggling going on near their habitations. They give this information invariably under an assurance that their names are not to be made known; otherwise their property, if not their lives, would be in peril.

Mr. SARGENT's report for the year named estimates the value of the goods seized by these agents at the port of New York at $731,070 35, over half the value of the goods seized at all other ports in the country, including Providence. The goods thus seized are chiefly taken from the trunks or persons of steamship passengers, and are very well covered up in their hiding-place. We have illustrated on page 564 the system of collecting the custom on the contraband articles in possession of the passengers landing from the city or will find the series of pictures a very interesting study.

The articles sperandi pursued by the inspectors and agents is as follows: They assemble at the Barge Office, which is located at the extreme southern edge of New York City, and receive their names on a book kept for the purpose. When a steamer is signaled from the Highlands or entering the Narrows the inspectors are all ready and the two inspectors first named in the list embark in her to board the incoming vessel. On welcoming them on board the captain of the steamer hands them a copy of his manifest. As soon as the steamer is made fast the passengers leave her for the dock. Their baggage is quickly taken out and placed on the dock; and the passengers make their declaration or statement as to the contents of each trunk. If they contain dutiable articles, and the fact is announced, the owners are permitted to pay the duty and secure their baggage at once; if, on the contrary, they assert that they have only articles of wearing apparel, and such personal effects as travelers usually carry, and an examination reveals uncut silks, laces, jewelry, etc., the officers seize the goods and confiscate them in the name of the law. Female assistants are always on hand upon the arrival of a steamer, and assist in searching suspected persons of their own sex. The custom-house officer remains on duty on the steamer as long as she remains in port.

THE PAPAL ZOUAVES.

THE idea generally prevails that the government of the Papal States is wholly ecclesiastical, and that only the priests take part in its administration. There are some persons who imagine that the Pope's income is composed entirely of "contributions," and that the inhabitants of the States consists only in the sale of indulgences or special permits to "go and sin more." Many be under the impression that instead of keeping a standing army to sustain his peculiar church, as MOHAMMED did to spread his peculiar religion, the Pope simply keeps on hand a full and complete assortment of canes and excommunications, which he hurls at the heads of offending parishioners or refractory subjects. These notions take. The Government was entirely ecclesiastical until the accession of the present Pope, PIUS IX. He thought it necessary, in order to sustain his temporal power, to establish a cabinet of civil officers little differing from those of other European States, and to recruit an army just like that of monarchs less holier than himself. The Council of Ministers is under the foreign relations, examine the affairs of the Ministerial Departments, promulgate measures for the public security of the State, etc. The army garrisons Rome and the three forts in the Papal Dominions, and prevents the populace of Rome from proclaiming itself a part of the Italian nation.

This army is a curious conglomerate mass. It is composed of Italians, Frenchmen, Austrians, Swiss, and Irish. There are no Germans. An effort was made to raise a battalion of Americans, but the scheme, although it had the approval of the Pope, was a complete failure: the only American who is known to have ever attached himself to the Pope's army is JOHN H. SURRATT. Soon after the order for enlistments was promulgated it was found that it was not only impracticable, to raise any considerable troops. Representations to this effect were made to the Pope by the Archbishops of Baltimore, Cincinnati, and New York, and on July 22 the Pope repealed the authority. The total force is 8000 infantry, 550 cavalry, 800 artillery, 150 engineers, and 88 staff—in all 9588. Some years ago it numbered 25,000, but the battle of Castelfidardo dispersed it, and it is only just now recommencing.

General KAZLER, the Commander-in-Chief, is actively engaged in consolidating the heterogeneous elements which compose it. One of the means employed by him consists in forming a camp every year, which usually lasts about eighty days, and which is designed successively to receive the troops of every arm of the service for training in the school of the soldier. The camp this year was situated within a stone's-throw of that of HANNIBAL in his famous march on Rome. One of the features of the annual encampment is a visit from the Pope, who goes to give counsel to his soldiers by a papal benediction, and the celebration of a High Mass. The Pope is not such a soldier as ALEXANDER, who always held that "Heaven was on the side that had the most guns;" nor like General SHERMAN, who once told a member of the Christian Commission that what his army needed was not trusts but crackers. He and his soldiers, too, have great faith in the efficacy of blessings, but it does not appear that they fight any better for it. Our illustration on page 565 represents the Papal infantry in camp receiving the benediction of the Pope.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ADVICE TO THOSE ABOUT TO MARRY.—Never marry a girl with a "spare" waist.

A lady recently advertised that she wanted a "gentleman for breakfast and tea;" while another, in the same journal, could be "received" by a well baked bullock.

LADIES' TRAINS.

A Handybook.

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
AUGUST, 1868.

Rule 1.—No train after this date will be made up of greater length than the height of the propelling power.

Rule 2.—In coming down heavy grades (from 60 to 100 feet per mile) the brakes will not be relied on as rapidly or safely will allow, but all accommodating trains will proceed slowly and frequently for all slow people to keep on the trains. Caution, however, is necessary in starting up while people are so engaged, to prevent accidents.

Rule 3.—All trains to be held up at crossings. All empty "flats" standing on the "sidings" at the time should be ordered off.

Rule 4.—When three or more trains are proceeding in company they should always move side by side, and on no account whatever change the position. Trains approaching from the opposite direction must keep out of the way. (This rule applies to Rule 5.—It is desirable to attach a "dud" to a moving train, speed should be slackened and signals given by blowing. The "dud" will respond by throwing away its cigar, leaving the lemonades and shouting its last. The answering signal is a smile, which signifies "coming on" after "coupling" the combined train will proceed very slowly—very.

FIFTH AVENUE FASHION CIRCULAR.

MRS. Tomtoodle rose at 11.32 yesterday morning, and was dressed at 4.

MRS. Foote called on her dentist last week, and left her measure for a set of upper teeth. Her husband is delighted. She can't talk till she gets them.

MRS. Arrimite Penelope Hermione Sally Jones has a new poodle. P.S.—The "dear creature" the cost $1,000 in Paris, arrived on Saturday, but we are happy to announce him convalescent.

MR. HIBBON MacFIB Von O'Toole took a walk on the Avenue last evening. He was accompanied by his cane and mustache.

MISS O'Schneider had her weekly hysterics the day before yesterday.

MISS Gazelle forgot to paint her cheeks, and was consequently mistaken for the commander-in-chief. Rebosus by her betrothed. Consequences likely to be fatal, if not to Bo, at least to Jess.

MR. Dandy was bitten by a cowardly mosquito, in the back of the neck, at 6.15 P.M., Monday. Result, some polite profanity.

THOMAS Hemtrancher, Esq., made an impression last night on—an easy-chair.

MISS Brownett (with two's) is in love with a—duck of a bonnet.

MISS Misanthrope's King Charles dog was clipped lately. His birthday, which is on Tuesday next, will be celebrated by a large party.

"DO you ever have any 'hops' in Maine?" asked a Newport belle, who was dressing for a ball, of a country youth from the Pine State. "Oh yes, lots; I'a has forty acres of them in our field."

CURE FOR LOVE.—Ride in a closet half a dozen times and listen to the conversation which takes place between a couple who have been married one year, while the child themselves entirely alone.

AND WILL HE SUPPER.—A gentleman who inhabits a "haunted house" felt so weak last night that the other day that "he could have been" knocked down with a crow-bar," became a friend said to him, "May your shadow never grow less!"

A cynical wag seeing on the tomb of a wife whom he knew to be a perfect scold, the inscription, "I shall rise again," added the words, "but don't let my poor husband know of it!"

A thirty-two months' girl in Worcester thus accosted her pastoral relative a day or two ago: "Papa, will you buy me some bokes to put in my pocket? I can have some ear-rings!" Papa is now looking for the bokes.

HYMENEAL COX.—Why should weddings always be celebrated in the belfry?—Because it's the proper place for bell-ringing.

"Friend Mallaby, I am pleased that thee has got such a fine organ in thy church." "But," said the clergyman, "I thought you were strongly opposed to having an organ in a church?" "So I am," said Friend Grubby, "but then, if the will wouldn't run Lord with machinery, I would like thee to have a first-class steward."

A MARNER'S SOLILOQUY.—'Tis wondrous strange how great the change since I was in my teens; then I had to lean, and a table-d'hote, and joined the game scenes. But lovers now have ceased to vow; no way they now coquettes—to poison, hang, or drown themselves, because I'm thirty-five. Once, if the night was ever so bright, I'd see no shroud could rouse, without—the bliss, the honor, Miss, of seeing you safe home." Now I go, through rain and snow, to spend the earnest silver—through all the dark, without a spark—because I'm thirty-five.

"PERSONALS."

—Jones is going to Europe.

—Mr. Hardcash has gone to Saratoga.

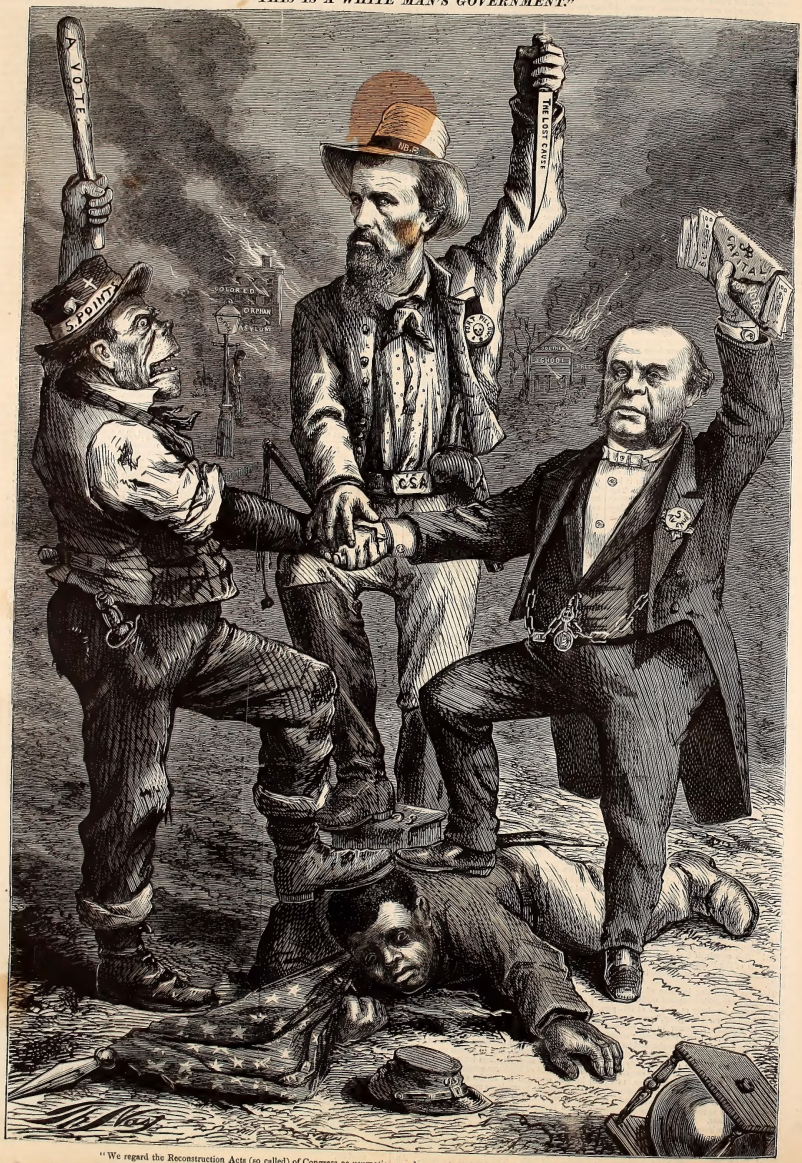
—Smith didn't have any place to go, and no money to go there with, so he has gone mad.

—Owing to the unaccountable absence of the cook this morning, Mrs. Pia Tidious was compelled to go into the kitchen and get breakfast. Hopes are entertained of her recovery.

—Miss Arabella King Charles poodle has had a fortune to fell to him by England. He is doing well.

—Hans Fritzlich is building a new chimney to his shanty.

—Willie had a sun-stroke last week. He says he has had every thing now except a competency.



—Sea-Serpent Dick has returned from his two-years' visit to the Penitentiary much improved in health. He will resume the business of wood-sawing at his old stand.

Van Amburg's elephant, being enveloped in a huge blanket, was pulling the festive natives of Ivry from the ground by pooking his trunk through an opening in the covering, observing which a son of the Emerald Isle, who had just entered, exclaimed: "And what sort of a baste is that attic hay with his tail?"

LEFT BEHIND.

See the Illustration on Page 569.

Now the old, weary light
Is wrapped in shadows, and the moon's astray—
I am alone to-night,
And sad, for he had never been away
Until he went up into Heaven to-day.

The time has seemed so long!
'Twas early when the angels came for him;
Only a bird's first song
Was heard in the trees, and all the sky was dim
Save one white line upon its outer rim.

They came so silently,
They passed so soft I never knew them nigh.
They might have pitied me.
Kind ones—they might have let me say good-by!
He will not hear me now, Heaven is so high.

How shall I learn the change?
I can not reason; grief has made me slow.
The one that's left is strange—
He waits a while, and then he, too, will go;
The one that's gone I can not see or know.

I shall not hear of him,
I can not tell if he is far or nigh;
Down here, where skies are dim,
I shall be waiting while the years go by,
The weary years to come before I die.

Ah me, if I had thought
God's people stood close by me in the dawn,
I would so have besought,
So wept, so prayed, they never could have gone,
They never would have left me thus forlorn!

I know I must be still,
They tell me pain is good when it is past;
They say it is God's will
To make his children happier at last;
But oh, the future looks so vague and vast!

'Tis growing dark and late,
And there are lights set in the house on high.
If there be fairer state—
If there be dearer love up in the sky,
Perchance it is a pleasant thing to die.

We, who are left alone,
Do fret so, down in the dark, and call and weep;
Do cry so for our own.
It will be well when stillness grows so deep
We can forget the world and fall asleep!

HANNAH R. HUDSON.

TWO FOOLS.

"SILENCE," they say, "is golden." If so, the speechlessness of Miss Percy's lovers was a fortune in itself. Up to her thirty-fifth birthday her admirers, if she had any, had kept their thoughts to themselves, choosing to let concealment prey upon their damask cheeks rather than tell their love.

That they should all, with one accord, maintain such strict notions of propriety was a singular coincidence. It was as if they had entered into a league to stand and adore at a respectful distance.

Why this should be so Miss Percy was at a loss to imagine. Her manners were undeniably gracious (indeed she had already smiled away a set of natural teeth); and she had admission to the first circles of society. It really did seem unkind in some man that he did not propose.

The deeper Miss Percy dived into the recesses of her brain to discover the cause of this masculine fault of omission, the deeper grew the mystery. She was not a beauty; but what of that? She was certainly a blue; she knew the poets from Chaucer to Tennyson, besides possessing the "deep, poetic heart" in her own right. "Depth," in fact, was her forte; perhaps, if any thing, she was rather too deep. At all events she was not understood. Alas! Such has been the fate of peculiar worth from the foundation of the world.

"I stand on an eminence grand and solitary," sighed Miss Stephanie, gazing in her mirror. "I feel my wrinkles. Thirty-five to-day. The noon of life. I see the 'noon-mark' on my forehead. Let me think," she continued, earnestly, "Yes, I will marry! Before the year is over 'the only daughter of the Honorable Rufus Percy, one of our first citizens, shall be led to the altar by—by—' Well, time enough yet to make a choice."

"Stephanie," said Mrs. Percy, breaking in upon her daughter's reverie, "what cap shall I wear to the wedding?"

"Wedding? Wedding?" repeated Stephanie, with an air of bewilderment; for in her dream she seemed to be already kneeling in bridal robes, and was just about receiving the ring upon her taper finger.

"Yes," continued Madam Percy. "Of course I desire to make a respectable appearance. I don't know, for my part, why I shouldn't care as much as I did when I was young. It strikes me a few orange flowers wouldn't be amiss in the border."

"What border?"

"Why, my cap-border, dear."

"Bless me, mamma, where are you going with a cap?"

"Stephanie, my love, I am talking of our Golden Wedding. What else do you suppose?"

"To be sure, mamma; I had forgotten," sighed Stephanie, now fully aroused to the fact that she was not at the altar, and that the bridegroom was yet undiscovered. "No wonder I can not make it possible that such a bright-eyed old lady has been married fifty years. Why, mamma, when I celebrate MY Golden Wedding do you know I shall be eighty-five!"

"A hundred more likely," laughed Mrs. Percy, spreading some elegant lace over a chair back and admiring the delicate pattern. "No, Stephanie; I have given you up entirely. What say to my wearing a pearl-gray silk with this rich lace? How finely it would light up with my diamonds!"

"You seem to be easily discouraged about me,"

"Yes, they say we shall travel to the moon in a balloon," said Mrs. Percy, coolly; "but I doubt it. Now about these invitations?"

"My sweet mother, your raillery is quite out of taste!" exclaimed Stephanie, with some agitation. "If I have been so fastidious in my early youth as to slight good opportunities, it is not too late yet to repent."

"Very true; but I advise you to

'Be wise with speed;
A fool at forty is a fool indeed.'

Now do turn your attention to my cap."

But the sentimental young lady murmured to herself, unheeding the question of caps and wedding-cake:

"Come to me, O my love, my fate,
Ere all be cold and desolate;
Come, I have sought thee far and near;
Come, lest I wither while I wait;
It is the evening of the year."

"I don't see what is going to be done with our Stephanie," wailed Madam Percy to her husband; "she seems to have every gift of mind except common-sense. On all subjects but love she talks rationally."

"Yes, there's a screw loose about the poor child," responded the head of the family. "Not that we love her less than any of the eight who are married and settled in life; but we certainly can not take that pride in her we did in them."

"I accept it as a discipline," said Madam Percy, patting her gray curls, "sent to humble us and lead us away from the vanities of this present evil world."

After which pious remark the good lady devoted herself for the rest of the evening to dyeing her hair, which was so intensely white as to be of itself another means of discipline.

The night of the Golden Wedding rolled around, and was smiled upon by all the stars of heaven. It was a perfect evening in June. The Percy mansion was overflowing with guests; and, to suit a poetical fancy of Stephanie's, the trees upon the lawn were hung with colored lanterns, which lighted up the flower-beds with various grotesque colors, and converted the neatly-trimmed hedge and luxuriant grass into the appearance of a huge kaleidoscope.

Stephanie gazed upon the enchanted scene with eyes that had in them a far-away look. She was thinking of the beloved unknown.

"'Oh face that I have never seen,'" she softly repeated to herself, "'come to me, my love, my fate!'"

But as yet, among the gay throngs of relatives and friends, no such face had appeared, no strange guest, who could be mistaken for a "love" or a "fate;" only Uncle Johns, Aunt Matildas, and cousins and cousinesses to the third and fourth generation, with a due sprinkling of well-meaning friends, who could not claim the least relationship, but were freely tolerated on account of their golden gifts.

"My prophetic soul tells me he is coming yet," thought Stephanie, who had been reading "Elective Affinities" that morning, interspersed with dribblets of "Maud" and "The Princess." "I wonder if he will know me by delicate intuition?" pursued Miss Percy. "I believe I am looking my best to-night."

This was probably true; but a superficial observer would have classed poor Stephanie with the "hopelessly unmarried." She had no features in particular and was far from being a fright; but with all her studied elegance, acquired in the best society, she was woodeny, with the straightness and stiffness of an old-fashioned clothes-pin. She also wore a decided mustache, which seemed a waste of substance, considering the poverty of her large head in respect to hair. However, it is not of the least use for wise people to declare of the uncertain future that this or that event will not take place. Stephanie had a hope, though it bordered on despair, a glimmering hope that to-night would be a turning-point in her destiny. And, as if the hitherto hard Fates were suddenly mollified by her appeal to their mercies, the curtain actually rose upon a remarkable arrival. The word "curtain" is to be understood in a metaphorical sense; for as a matter of fact the strange gentleman alluded to was first seen out of doors directly in range of a green lantern. He was tall and well formed, with commanding presence and clearly cut features. He had just entered this variegated fairy-land, and was standing near Miss Percy, though truth compels us to say with no delicate intuition that he was "the coming man."

"Miss Percy—Mr. Pendleton," said a mutual friend. And so the first step was taken, and every body knows it is "the first step that costs."

Stephanie looked up and met a pair of brilliant eyes shining down upon her with respectful admiration.

"Welcome, Sir," said she, impulsively, "welcome to this happy land where

'Every flower writes music on the air.'"

An auspicious beginning this, with poetry to start with! Stephanie, being seized with a new idea, made a hasty movement backward, and nearly lost her balance over a verbena-bed.

"Can it be, Sir, that this is our cousin Hosea Pendleton?" ("Our unmarried cousin," she added, mentally.)

"The same, dear Madam, and your humble servant ever. As I chanced in Boston I saw a notice of your Golden Wedding there, and hastened here to pay you my respects."

"He talks in blank verse," thought the enraptured Stephanie.

"Allow me to congratulate you, my dear Madam. Time has most kindly dealt with you."

"Oh, you flatter, Sir."

Little dreamed the fair Stephanie of the mistake her guest was making. Owing to his near-sightedness and the deceitful hue which the green lanterns threw across her thin features, he supposed he was addressing the venerable bride of move, Mrs. Percy. But he was soon undeceived; for his cousin of the fourth remove, Miss Stephaine, immediately suggested that she was ready to lead him indoors and present him to her respected parents, who were standing in the hall under a blazing coronet of gas-light.

Mr. Pendleton could see, despite his poor eyesight, that he was the lion of the evening. Stephanie clung to him like a sweet-pea. Stay; this is mixing metaphors. Who ever heard of a sweet-pea's clinging to a lion? Rather he was the star of the evening, and she a humble fire-fly looking up at him in a fervent glow of adoration. To say that her appreciation of him was without effect upon Mr. Pendleton would be to do injustice to the most susceptible of men. All his life long—and he was now of mature age—he had been a silent adorer of ladies. To hold silk for them, to sit in a corner and gaze on them, to hand them to their carriages, to be in some sort a foot-stool for their charming feet, had been to him a precious privilege. They all seemed willing to be admired; but when it came to serious intentions Mr. Pendleton had always found them exceedingly coy. Sometimes they declared they were averse to matrimony altogether; but their objection was soon overruled by some happier swain; so the discomfited Hosea had often been doomed to look on at their weddings, holding a bouquet of flowers before his breaking heart. The number of times that brittle organ had been broken and mended was an anatomical curiosity; still at the time of his introduction to his fair cousin it was as good as new and quite ready to be demolished again by whom it might concern. Not that Stephanie was likely to prove dangerous, but there were a few lovely young girls in the company who might.

As Hosea looked about him his dying hopes revived again. He felt an insane desire to distinguish himself in some way, and so win the favor of these unknown charmers. Toasts and speeches were going the rounds; he determined to make a speech himself. True, he had never undertaken such a thing in public but once, and then had broken down ingloriously; but to-night he felt inspired; he should immortalize himself, he knew. He stole softly along to Dr. Shaw, the master of ceremonies, and whispered in his ear, "You'd better call on Mr. Pendleton to make a speech."

Now who Mr. Pendleton might be was a profound mystery to Dr. Shaw; but at the next opening he politely invited that mythical gentleman, "if present, to come forward and offer a few remarks."

To the worthy doctor's surprise the summons was answered by the very person who had whispered the suggestion. Stephanie, not being in the secret, was delighted to see the magnificent Mr. Pendleton walk out and take possession of the door-stone. The manner in which he did it was truly imposing. There was an expectant hush in the air.

"My dearly beloved uncle and aunt," exclaimed the amateur orator, with a grand flourish; and then stopped. He had made a mistake in the relationship, to begin with.

"My dear cousins," resumed he, after a pause long enough to count sixty; and stopped again. The fountain of inspiration had been choked at the first gush.

"Poor soul! Can it be that my presence disconcerts him?" thought Stephanie, in a flutter.

"Or—ahem!—I mean—ahem! I did not intend to be called forth; I had no intention of coming forth—and—and—so forth!"

A preternatural gravity settled upon the guests. Another pause ensued, during which Stephanie's heart throbbed with sympathy, and her mother was "disciplined" to the last degree of endurance. Then, with a desperate jerk, Mr. Pendleton caught up the thread of his discourse again.

"I did propose to—to—propose to—offer my-self—myself to offer—a few remarks."

But after wiping the drops of anguish from his forehead, and throwing an appealing glance at the ceiling, the poor man gave it up, and added:

"But there seem to be no—no remarks to offer!" and rushed off the door-stone in despair.

Little Mrs. Blossom, being rather hysterical, giggled outright, to her own shame and consternation. The well-bred Mr. Percy looked apoplectic; his lady wife seemed to be roasting mentally over a fire for martyrs; the tender Stephanie alone felt pity for the man who had tried to speak and made a cat's cradle of the thread of his story.

"Poor dear!" thought she; "if, as I believe, we have each met our fate to-night, no wonder we feel a tumult of the soul. It is a pity, though, he should attempt to deliver an oration under such circumstances!"

She looked up, to see the man leaning over her chair.

"Well, fair cousin," said he, with the utmost composure, "how did I do? Made a mess of it, didn't I?"

"Not so very bad, Mr. Pendleton."

"I stammered, I know I did," returned the orator, candidly. "I forgot my speech; but how can you expect a man to remember any thing under such a battery of bright eyes?"

Stephanie's dull orbs shot forth a very unnecessary sparkle. She did not know that Fanny Blossom and Mary Bell, the two mischievous girls standing close by, constituted the bright-eyed battery; and that Mr. Pendleton's heart had already undergone a slight shock.

"I am sorry you should feel any embarrassment," said she, with a conscious blush.

"I have the misfortune to be so very susceptible," sighed Mr. Pendleton, casting a tender glance toward the pink and white Blossom, who was regarding him with a smile.

"What a pity, Mr. Pendleton," said the Blos-

"Very gallant, I am sure," chimed in the Bell, laughing behind her fan.

"Little did I dream of meeting such attractions when I came," exclaimed Mr. Pendleton, rapturously patting the left pocket of his vest as he spoke.

Miss Stephanie was startled. What would he say next? There was such peculiar guilelessness about the man, such unworldly simplicity, that it was barely possible he might propose on the spot. Stephanie was ready and waiting for the declaration; but she did not wish it proclaimed from the housetop; she very much preferred that it should be spoken decently and in order.

"Come, my friends," said she, starting up with the grace of a wooden doll on wires, "let us join the party in the music-room."

But alas! as they obeyed her suggestion it somehow happened that she and Mr. Pendleton drifted away from each other in the crowd. She did not see him again until the close of the evening. He made his adieu very politely, it is true, but she could not fail to perceive that the impassioned tenderness was gone from his voice and manner; there was no longer the slightest danger of a declaration. Danger, indeed! Stephanie groaned as she laid her weary head on the pillow.

"It is just like me," said she. "I was always nipping my proposals in the bud. Mr. Pendleton was certainly impressed; but now he has gone away discouraged."

"Oh, Stephanie," said Mrs. Percy next morning, in a tone of extreme vexation, "what a perfect success the whole affair would have been if that stupid cousin—"

"Mamma," replied Stephanie, with flaming cheeks, "I presume you refer to the princely Mr. Pendleton. I am sorry he blundered so sadly. His is pre-eminently the gift of silence, and he should not have attempted to speak. He confessed to me that he is a very susceptible man, and the—ahem—the unexpected pleasure of meeting me—"

"Unexpected fiddlesticks!" broke in mamma, forgetting her manners. "If you have but a thimbleful of brains, Stephanie, it is your duty to make use of that thimbleful. Cousin Hosea is certainly a simpleton; but, for all that, he does not care about you. I heard the man with my own ears making love to Fanny Blossom. I could wish," added Madam Percy, pouring a cup of coffee with an air of resignation, "I could wish you had common-sense, but, my daughter, your weakness of intellect is my discipline; I accept it as such."

Poor Stephanie gazed at her dry toast as sorrowfully as if it had been the remains of her last friend. The bright hope which had sprung up the night before seemed to have gone out with the light in the green lantern.

But she despaired too soon. Cousin Hosea had not been smitten by her mature charms, it is true; still she was destined to hear from him again; the Fates, grown merciful at last, were turning the tide in her favor. Ashamed of his failure as an orator, the brilliant Mr. Pendleton determined to show Misses Blossom and Bell that, at least, he knew how to write. So he droned away at a dull sketch of the Golden Wedding, published it in a newspaper, and sent it exultantly to those blooming young ladies, and also, as a matter of form, to his pensive cousin Stephanie.

Miss Percy's sensitive spirits rebounded from freezing point to summer heat in a moment.

"He has not forgotten me, mamma! See how my fate seems to hang on that one evening, as I always thought it would!"

"Your fate, you foolish child!"

"She does not appreciate; she can not understand," thought Stephanie. "Why do I speak to her of my deepest feelings? I will act for myself. Hitherto I have been bound by conventionalities; I have nearly shipwrecked my happiness by being too coy. I will now try what a little boldness will do."

Seizing a pen, she wrote at once to thank Mr. Pendleton for his kindness in sending the interesting newspaper. She delicately hinted at the unusual pleasure his brief acquaintance had given her, and trusted he would generously pardon any unintentional coldness he might have observed in her manner on the night of the Golden Wedding, for verily it had not been dictated by her heart.

"This will encourage him," thought Stephanie, with a sigh of relief; "he will surely answer my letter."

He did. Mr. Pendleton had never received such a missive before, so elegantly expressed, so replete with kindly interest. What she meant by "coldness" he could not divine; and concluded it must be a figure of speech. His reply was thoroughly commonplace, but studied with extreme care. Mr. Pendleton's advantages had been good, and he could write correct English.

Stephanie was alarmed. She was too happy; she was afraid to trust to her emotions.

"I have been deceived a thousand times," thought she. "How many men have seemed to be just as nearly on the point of proposing as Mr. Pendleton is, yet have passed me by on the other side? Another disappointment would crush me."

Stephanie tremblingly took up her diamond-pointed pen again.

"It certainly will do no harm for me to ask him what his intentions are."

"Because, my beloved friend," wrote she, tearfully, "I feel that I can not allow myself to be trifled with!"

"Trifled with! Good gracious!" exclaimed the astonished Mr. Pendleton, dropping the letter at the third paragraph, as if it had contained explosive properties.

He let it lie on the floor till he had rubbed his bald head to the color of a peony.

"As if I wouldn't give a pretty sum if I only knew how to trifle!"

Then, being a very susceptible and ill-used man, who had always stood in vain for a lady's love, he took up the letter reverently and—pressed it to his lips.

"Well, well, to think of my making a conquest at last! Hosea Pendleton, is this you? John Meader says wives come to us like fourleaved clovers, when we least expect it. How What! that old maid? Homely, too. I must declare it's none of my seeking. That shows it's fate! What a deep impression I've made! Poor girl! She is the first that ever seemed to appreciate my real worth. Begs me not to trifle with her! Certainly I won't. And an heiress in her own right! 'Am I serious?' she asks. 'Why, of course I am. And really I do consider I never thought before! Mr. Pendleton's next letter contained a formal offer of marriage. It was the first Stephanie had ever received, but there was no mistaking the ring of the true metal.

"Oh mamma, congratulate me!" she cried. "You fortunate child, who would ever have dreamed of your marrying at your time of life; and such a simpleton as Cousin Hosea!"

"After all, he's a good family, my dear," said aristocratic Mr. Percy, trying to choke down his chagrin, and call up his philosophy; "a branch of my own family. What could be more respectable?"

Yes, my dear husband; if a fool ratches a fool it is all right, and we should consider it a matter of discipline," was the pious response. Poor Stephanie is only happy, I will accept the boon without a murmur."

And Stephanie was happy, supremely so; Mr. Pendleton also, as soon as he had duly consulted the matter. They settled down to a quiet, harmless life; and it came to pass as years went on that they appeared to be a little more than commonly sensible. The numerous disappointments of the heart which had made them both so cruelly conscious were now healed forever, and there were a brilliant couple they have ceased to be regarded as two fools.

PARIS ON VELOCIPEDES.

YOUNG PARIS is just now carried away by the rage for velocipedes; and these machines are now the crowning nuisance of the grand, new avenues of the great City. They are machines with two broad wheels, across which the rider sits and propels the instrument and himself with his legs. Parties of men go out velocipeding just as our fast youths go out yachting or driving or skating. Sometimes an enthusiast may be seen flashing through the streets in quick steeds, puffing and rushing like a railway train. The "knowing ones" survey each other's velocipedes with the awful solemnity with which horsey men survey the points of a horse. The other day, the sprightly little Queen, Eutima Montez, on a visit to Paris, from the east coast of Africa, near Mozambique, was terrified by the sudden appearance of one of these grotesque vehicles, carrying a young dandy along like the wind, and her sudden shriek was duly placed on record.

A rich proprietor of Valence was also compelled to leave a city of shame when he looked himself face to face with a couple of velocipedes on the public road, and his frightened horses upsetting his carriage into a ditch. The gendarmes brought the case into court, but got no damages.

This nuisance is one of the "awful" punishments which Napoleon has brought upon himself by improving the Parisian streets. Napoleon has persisted in macadamizing and asphaltizing the roads until they are so smooth that the velocipedes roll as swiftly along them as they would across a parlor floor, and as noiselessly, too, as if rubber were carpeted. The consequence is that the possessors are flinging themselves all over the city. The Parisians scarcely know whether to laugh or scowl over this new rage, which they will assuredly run to death for all would let them.

It is the repaving of Broadway with the improved Belgian, and the extension of the Nicholson and Stuart pavements in New York, to effect the same nuisance on this City and people. Central Park to be given up next summer to the velocipede skaters? Young New York, no doubt, will shortly drive some of these vehicles in the Central Park and along Fifth Avenue.

This new mania, over which Paris is so excited, is after all not one. It was known many years ago in London, England, as the "mania for bobby-horses." For two or three years, from 1819–22, it raged there, and an account of the mania says that "it might literally be said every man had his hobby. Bobby-horses were to be seen in every street, and even to be used in the road, not only round London, but near most of the country, whither this fashion had been carried. Dandies, or not dandies, all were infected with this strange mania, which furnished matter for caricature upon caricature in great abundance.

There is an old cut in existence taken from a caricature published on the 8th of April, 1819, representing the military episcopal Duke of York —he was commander-in-chief and prince-bishop of Osnaburg—riding his hobby for economy, on the road to Windsor. It was a period at which the outcry against the extravagance of the civil list—in which the Duke partook largely—was particularly loud and violent. John Bull, who is somewhat astonished at the figure cut by the royal hobby-rider and his boasts of economy, exclaims: 'Dang it, Mister Bishop, does not saving, indeed, thee used to rule in a coach and six; now I pay thee £10,000 a year more, thee must be riding a wooden horse for all the world like a gate-post.'"

TIME'S HEALING.

TRUE worth wonders in its onward course:
To those who bear that burden on its mute heart
He lendeth courage, energy, and force.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

Time creepeth with a feeble ing'ring pace,
He bendeth down his aged back and stoops;
Yet aids the weary on in their toilsome race.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

Beneath the shelter of his soft dusk wing
He leadeth on in welcome shade to peace,
And gently moveth with unfailing step.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

His scythe, with noiseless sure-y-sweeping swath,
Mows down sin, problems, questions, strife,
Induces amity, assuages wrath.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

His kind old hand, for all its trembling old,
Hath oft the skill to disentangle knots
That we have wrought unwittingly in gold.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

The silent dropping of his hour-glass sand
Is like the unheard stealing on of years,
That "counteth not with us" from God's hand.
Then, "bring forth fruit with patience," O my soul!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

NOT long ago an English gentleman was rowing about a small lake with seven of his children and one or two friends. A little girl, three years old, leaned over the side to dabble her hands into the water. Her father jumped in after and seized her just once or twice, and then sank never to reappear alive. The probability is that he could swim a little; but his knowledge of the art could hardly have been sufficient to be of any practical use, even to himself, in ordinary circumstances. It has been proved that he was in a "difficult gymnastic fact" to support even an inanimate body in the water. Very few people in real and drags down his would-be preserver. An English Journal, in commenting upon the accident which has occasioned, gives some suggestions in regard to trying to save another in the water. If the drowning person is insensible he must be moved by the hair, or "even by one hand; but when may power of struggling, or clasping, remains, he must be left only one method. The swimmer should, with his right hand, seize his friend by the back of the neck, or, better still, under the arm from behind. He should keep the body upright, and, in nearly no case will the drowning person attempt to clasp his preserver. It is necessary to place to which he can cling and support his companion till help arrives. The outward motion so far underneath a drowning person and treading water. A swimmer makes the mistake of trying to raise the head above the water, which is quite unnecessary. These directions, simple as they are, could not, of course, be followed in an emergency unless, in addition to a good knowledge of the art of swimming, one retains his presence of mind.

In France swimming is especially taught, and there is hardly a town of any importance, if situated on a river, without its floating bath and swimming school. In England, however, the latter is not so common; nor are there any adequate arrangements made by local governing authorities in most American cities for bathing and swimming.

Cotton should be used not only in preventing the spread of the contagion of smallpox, but also in handling the deceased cattle. In the vicinity of Troy a man skinned two cows which had died. His wife washed the hides and preserved them. She used buckets, and in this manner the poisonous matter or virus was transferred into the skin. This began to be noticed, and pain him very much. He consulted a physician, but his condition rapidly grew worse until he resulted in his death. A mother, who had washed the deceased during his illness, was also infected by contact, and is in a critical condition.

At this season, when mortality among children from cholera infantum is excessive, a few suggestions for the preservation of health by a physician of this city in New York, may be useful: Preserve cleanliness of room, clothes, and person of child, and secure fresh air for it. Use the following articles: soap and towels at all times, and other covering to suit the changes of weather. Let child wear flannel next to the skin; and nurse, its milk should be prepared as follows: Boil a tea-spoonful of ground barley with a gill of water for fifteen minutes; to which add a gill of milk, half the amount of boiled milk, and a lump of loaf-sugar; give it to the child with bakerware. If the child is over six months old, the boiled milk and barley-water should be in equal quantities. If the child is costive use arrow-root instead of barley flour, or oatmeal prepared, strained before it is mixed with the milk. Beef tea or beef soup may be added to the food for five months, or older. No child under two years of age should be allowed the miscellaneous diet of the table.

The Paris Ballroom Reporter gives an account of exciting sheds over the exposed parts of their track to protect it against the deep snows of the Sierra Nevada mountains. Last winter the sheds that had been built were crushed by the weight of the snow that fell upon them. They were made of long logs laid on heavy timber frame-work, with pointed gable roofs, and look as if they could withstand almost any pressure of snow. But the weight of the drifts was found to be thus covered, and the quantity of timber required will be enormous. Not less than twenty-two sawmills, most of them worked by steam, are run night and day, employing nearly two thousand men; and yet they do not work up to the needs of the Company. In a few weeks twenty-eight mills will be running. It is estimated that it will require no less than 800,000 feet of lumber to construct a mile of sheds.

There is some comfort in the dim and distant future for those who suffer great irritation from the bites of mosquitoes. The Yokohama Journal mentions it as a curious fact that the susceptibility of the whole, or different parts, of the system to the action of poisons and irritants appears to be limited, and the bites of mosquitoes, the action or reciprocals, and the power of vaccine and other matters, can not be made to perpetuate their effects on one and the same system. So, after being poisoned enough, we shall be proof against their bites. Experience is to our relief. Better long bills as their perpetuo; notes that annoy; and nothing is better than our energy to keep the creatures at a distance during the night.

It is stated that a French author, being desirous to write a history of Charles Dickens, wrote to that gentleman for materials, but received none, Mr. Dickens replying that he "had long ago formed the intention of writing an autobiography."

A curious story is told by the Nashville Banner of a wolf-chase through the town of Talladoma. A party of hunters were on their way to the mountains, when their hounds run upon a wolf by accident. A race ensued. The wolf, not having time to choose his course, went tearing through the streets of Talladoma at a tremendous rate, pursued by hounds and hunters. Every body was excited in a trice—and almost every body, until the crowd numbered eight hundred. The excitement was increased by an offer made by the wolf to run for a wife or husband for the scalp of the wolf to the authorities of Talladoma. The race continued through streets and thru hours, when the exhausted creature, having been chased through the town two or three times, took refuge in the mail car of the Southern Express, which just arrived as the struggle was failing. The mail agent retired to the hinder of the car, and closely the train started, carrying the wolf, to the disappointment of the gathering crowd at the station. About the time the train got outside the town the monster jumped out and made good his escape.

The Green Mountain State has produced a wonderful story, which may have a moral to believe. This is the substance of the tale: There is a man in Vermont who can not speak to his father. Previous to his birth some difficulty arose between his mother and father, and for a considerable time she refused to speak with him, but the difficulty was subsequently healed. The child began to talk at the usual age, but was always silent when with the father. He so continued until five years old, when the father, having exhausted his powers of persuasion, inflicted punishment for what was regarded as his obstinacy. This elicited nothing but gibs and groans. The child apparently could not speak to him, although he endeavored to do so. And when the boy grew to mature age all efforts to converse with his father were fruitless. A curious mystery this!

A remarkable criminal trial has been recently held at Poen, Germany. A master bookbinder, named Wittman, was accused of having poisoned six persons in six years, namely, his four wives and two children. All of the wives had some property, and had made wills in favor of the husband before their death. On the death of the fourth wife suspicion was excited, and a thorough investigation was made, which resulted in proving that arsenic had been used to poison them all. Wittman has been sentenced to death. His motive seems to have been merely to obtain money.

In Syria the regulations pertaining to divorces are singular. If a man wishes to put his wife he can not her face again. If both man and wife agree to a divorce, it takes place; if not, there is a secret meeting held of the friends of the parties, called the assembly of verification. If the fault be on the side of the husband, he must pay to the wife the wife the half of the property, and vice versa. One of the most singular customs of the Druses is, that if news, true or false, go about a man that he divorced his wife, she can send scribe for him, and says: "The news of your divorce having reached me, I am divorced." And if the man should say, "I have not divorced my wife," it is of no avail.

The fifty-one incident may even a rough one; but the uneducated Irishman brusquely expresses a feeling which may, after all, be not better, judge when there is no occasion for prayer until danger is imminent. Two raftsmen were caught recently in a gale on the Mississippi. The raft was just emerging from Lake Pepin as the squall came. In an instant it was pitching and writhing as if suddenly dropped into Hayaguha, while the water broke over her with tremendous ocean. Expecting instant destruction, one of the men fell on his knees in the water, beginning a pole in the water at the side of the raft.

"Be silent, Pat," said the other, as he coolly continued to punch with his pole: "be easy, now, what's the use of praisin' when a feller can tech bottom with a pole?"

The Artesian well on the Colt estate in Hartford has now reached a depth of one thousand feet and 1400 feet. Work has been suspended on it during the extreme hot weather, but it is recommenced with the aid of a new and more powerful engine of greater power than the one hitherto used. The lowest rock yet struck in boring this well is a mica slate.

Don't sneeze too violently! A man in Nevada City sneezed his shoulder out of joint a week or two ago. Four men and a woman gave it considerable pulling to get it into place again.

The streets of London are watered with a weak solution of salt and chloride of lime. One watering a day is sufficient.

Is there not some truth in the following which we clip from an English paper?

"Every thing nowadays must be done on a large scale; a tea must be a big tea to be properly respected. The unhappy wretch maddened by drink or jealousy, who, in a moment of temporary insanity, gives a blow which deprives of life all that he loves best in the world, is not to be pitied, but to be execrated. He slays who, by mismanagement, kill a few hundreds of the human race, are honored and respected. The heartless creditor who, by his harshness, drives his unfortunate debtor to the benefit of the act of suicide, may be admired by all for his many charitable works. For our part we would, so far as possible, punish causes. If whenever a railway accident occurred, a couple of directors or railway officials were tied on to the 'buffers' of the engine and forced to travel time for a month or so daily, we much doubt if railway smashes for the next few weeks would be of such frequent occurrence."

Fashions repeat themselves in the course of years. We are able to understand a passage in Jeremy Taylor's work concerning the marriage of Manasseh, in the comedy, brings in a man turning his wife from his house because she stained her hair yellow, which was then the beauty." Menander flourished about three hundred years before the Christian Era.

The inhabitants of Sweden accounts for the terrible earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and tempests we have experienced within the past year or two by a theory that the crust of the Earth has been very seriously depressed and broken. He also intimates that, by the exit of subterranean fires and other causes, the axes of the Poles have been greatly reduced, and the angle of the equator with the plane of the ecliptic very perceptibly diminished.

A writer at the "Springs," in commenting upon the "prescribed manner" of imbibing Congress water, remarks that it "grows one," going to drink for the first time, walks carefully and timidly; if there is a crowd, he is the last man and every new-comer gets ahead: he takes the glass tremblingly and looks into it and through it; then he takes a swallow and looks beneath it, and another and another, as he would control, with a terrible pause: perhaps, having finished the first glass, he remembers that he may be watched, and so he quickly takes another, and then saves for a walk like a man who has done his duty. But your regular drinker is the first to come, and as laziness and tenacious of his place as the one next to the rail at a monkey's cage. He swallows glass after glass like water, and never stops when he is full to the throat. He then takes a turn or two to shake it down.

Why will not newspapers give important details when they tell about any thing wonderful or excellent? An exchange says: "There is a village out West so healthy that people die there. But we are obliged to go to the next town if they are tired of living; and there is a man who lived there so old that they did not know who they were, and nobody could tell them!" But what is the name of that village? Have the doctors carefully suppressed it?

Is there any limit to electrical wonders? The American Artisan describes a book containing 54,000 ems of solid matter which was both set and distributed by an electrical type-setting machine in six hours thirty-nine minutes. One of these machines, it is said, may be placed in a newspaper office in Boston or New York, and be operated on by a reporter in any other place connected with the machine by telegraph. That is, the reporter may take his notes to the telegraph office and send them at the distant office. Truly this is the age of inventions!

An old stone house in Guilford, Connecticut, is supposed to be one of the oldest houses now standing in the United States. It was erected by Leete, Governor who first settled the town, in 1646, for the use of their leader, a minister of the Church of England. The stone of which the building is constructed was brought, on hand-barrows, from a ledge some considerable distance from the place where the house now is. The cement used in building the walls is said to be harder than the stone itself. The house was used by the first settlers as a kind of fort, for some time, to defend themselves against the hostile savages.

An eccentric Irish gentleman has lately launched a yacht weighing sixteen tons on Lake Gowna. The yacht, however, was built in Dublin; so, when completed, it was necessary to cut it in two by twelve horses, and in her the owner, his wife, and retinue traveled to their castle; and in this way greatly enjoyed the journey, which occupied four or five days. All classes and creeds assembled to witness the singular spectacle; and many astounding comments were made by the quick-witted Irish.

A new method of ventilation, called the Rotten system, is announced. The distinctive feature of which is the introduction of warm air near the ceiling, and the causing out of cold air near the floor.

Newspapers certainly produce some literary as well as natural curiosities. For example, a Wisconsin paper says: "Last evening a fierce thunder-storm visited Mount Desert the lightning came down through the roof of a house, and struck Mrs. Brown while lay a husband and wife, throwing the latter out of bed, thence into the cellar and out through the drain, and then plowed up the ground in the field for about forty rods."

A Springfield journal tells of a horse which ran away in that city, "throwing the driver out and cutting a severe gash in one of his hind legs."

A notice of a recent steamboat explosion in a Western paper: "Killed and injured—The captain and mate. So did the chamber-maid: she was insured for $10,000, and busted with fear."

A Western editor describes the scene at a popular lecture thus: "Three thousand ladies were hanging on the words of the man. A pretty strong man this!"

A Syracuse printer, in setting up a book published several years since, construed one of Dickens's works thus: "'Barney,' by Rudge—$1 50."

A New York daily is responsible for the statement that a Connecticut Andrew was born in 1793, previous to which event he had two strokes of apoplexy, one in 1784, and the other in 1788.

Tooth-picks are inexpensive luxuries; consequently the first accident reported from Chicago last week must be noted as a casualty. A woman in that place died from the effects of swallowing the point of a needle, which broke off while she was picking her teeth with it.

The name of the new Territory is sometimes seen spelled Alaska, and sometimes Alaska. The former says: "I think the spelling 'Alaska' is a mistake, for which the Coast Survey in their first map of this country are partly responsible. On that map this country is spelled Alaska with an e. On inquiry there I found the spelling to be quite uniformly for the spelling, and on my suggestion it was altered to Alaska in a subsequent edition." It is a good rule to adopt the most simple mode of spelling words, which is sustained by good authority—therefore Alaska is preferable.

According to the Detroit Post there are the remains of many wrecks in the waters of Lake Erie, which, though deposited many years ago, are yet in an excellent state of preservation. No less than seven vessels are mentioned, among them the steamers Washington and Atlantic, considerable portions of which lie in the shallow water. Such a hull day the remains of the Atlantic are plainly visible.

ALASKA SCENES.

IT seems that Alaska, at $7,000,000, is not such a dear bargain after all. It is reported that a company of American capitalists have offered $10,000,000 in gold for the trading monopoly of the country, leaving the United States to carry on the government. We do not know how true this is, but the fur trade of the country alone appears to be so valuable that the Treasury Department at Washington has dispatched a special ship to Sitka to see to the suppression of the illegal collection of the skins by unauthorized persons, and the unlawful killing of the animals out of season. Laws and regulations for the protection of the animals in their breeding seasons are being prepared, and it is evident that the government authorities are of the opinion that the fur interests are valuable.

From all we can learn, however, the soil of Sitka is not the most valuable in those United States and Territories. We give on page 572 a couple of illustrations of Sitka, at a point where the coast will be convinced of the truth of this assertion. It is difficult to conceive of any more dreary-looking shore than that on the Yukon River (not Youcon, as the map-makers say). The first of these represents the artist's first sight of this, the principal river of Alaska. It runs to British Columbia, about two hundred miles east of Sitka, and runs due north through Alaska to the Arctic Sea. Of the first glimpse of this river the artist says: "About noon (of November 11, 1866) we could see a faint streak of blue over the land. We traveled hard to reach it, and at sundown broke from the woods, shot down a steep bank, and stood on an immense snow-covered field of ice, the mighty Yukon. Hardly a patch of 'clear' ice was to be seen; it was every where covered with a wintry mantle, the river in but a few places still open, and running swiftly. From bank to bank was not less than a mile, and each of the dismantled islands of the river were visible in either direction." The Yukon is the great highway of the country in winter for the fur-trader, hunter, and for every one or trader, and dog-sledges are universally used. When arrived at such a bank as that represented in our illustration, it is no uncommon thing for the sledge to run over the dogs, pushing them into the snow, but utterly harting them. The driver shies a club as best to impede the progress of the sledge, often by throwing himself on the ground, hanging on to it all the while, till it reaches the level surface of the river.

Another illustration represents the most northern post on the coast of Russian America—that at the mouth of the Unalcheed River, in Norton Sound, Behring Sea. The engraving shows a number of the Indians engaged, as they are constantly on the commencement of the winter, in fishing through holes in the ice of the river. A small kind of "white fish" is taken in quantities. Unalcheet is the starting-point on the coast of the direct route to the Yukon River, and the sketch represents the Unalcheet frozen up in mid-winter, as it appears during eight months of the year.

A CHINESE WEDDING.

CHINA is the Paradise of matrimonial matchmakers. An interesting thing is also by proxy—and the "go-between" is employed, not by the lovers, but their parents! The go-between is not even personally known to one, but he goes into the market and chooses hap-hazard. He is a sort of walking personal in the Herald—an amateur matrimonial agent. Altogether, courting in China is a very slow affair.

The marriage notices are never accompanied by the regulation phrase of "No cards." In fact is that "cards" precede the marriage, and the betrothal is not accomplished until cards on which are written the day, month, and year of the birth of the candidates for the holy state are exchanged, and then the parties are firmly bound forever. The marriage may take place in a month, or not until twenty years after, still the betrothed parties are bound by the exchange of cards, and cannot break them asunder.

The ceremony of marriage is very interesting. We give on page 575 an illustration of a marriage as witnessed by artist at Shanghai. The artist thus describes it in full:

While staying at Shanghai I was invited by the compradore of a banking house to visit his house upon an occasion of this interesting nature. The bridegroom was one of three sons, and one of the agents of the firm at Hakodadi; the bride was twenty years of age, and daughter of a wealthy native of native merchant. All the company wore their best clothes, and those of yellow and light colors predominated, lined with skins or embroidered, under which every lady wore a flower of blue silk; their heads were covered with silk or velvet hats topped with colored glass ornaments and tufts. They sat at several little tables, the guests at each, and feasted on twenty-six different dishes. The bridegroom, who was distinguished by wearing a large necklace of crystal and green jade, received the best and richest foods in presents from the company. After dining, smoking, and drinking tea, we were favored a concert of native performers on their instruments. A suite of guns was fired and a few crackers let off in the yard and the married couple, a gorgeously-decorated sedan-chair, or rather cage, in which they were to fetch the bride, arrived at four o'clock in the afternoon. The dining-room, in which the ceremony was to take place, had been cleared and garnished; only two tables being left, which were placed several large cushions, and decked with paper flowers and containing lighted candles; some pastiles were likewise set burning on the tables, in front of which a scarlet foot-cloth and cushions were placed, upon which the wedded pair were to pledge their mutual vows. The company was by this time increased by the arrival of many female wives of the male guests, handsomely attired in abundance of jewelry, loaded with ornaments, and a profusion of gay necklaces, bracelets, rings, with gold pins, and other ornaments, worn in their hair; they had also their pocket handkerchiefs. The chair in which the bride was carried having been brought into the room with the usual ceremonies, the curtains around the chair were then drawn aside by the bridal party, who carried out the bride, and a more gorgeous plumage, quite a bundle of embroidered silk, satin, black, and gold, with a belt of gold, silk and ivory round her waist, and her head crowned with a lyra of false jewels, and further decorated with crimson paper flowers upon a chignon, hung with a crimson silk veil, two feet in length, entirely hiding her face. The bridegroom had meantime come in from an adjoining room, preceded by a master of the ceremonies, with a lighted candle in each hand. Standing near one of the tables, he took three burning joss-sticks in his hands, and responded to the questions put to him by a priest, who, being stationed at the shrine of the joss or idol, some pictures of whom hung on the walls. The bride, having been placed beside him, supported by the old nurse, who had a little earlier fixed on her head, was similarly addressed, and made the proper responses. A green tea was then handed to the bridegroom, and a red one to the bride; these were knotted together, and drunk by the newly-married couple in the midst of his new wife to their nuptial chamber. Here several of their family friends, including two other wives of the same man, awaited them, ranged on each side of the bed, to present the customary wedding-medicines, and to bestow a quantity of ground seed and pills, of different sorts and colors, together, each pill not flat, but had sprinkled over them. After a little time the newly-married couple returned into the dining-room and sat down to a sumptuous repast. The bride was carefully taken away several times by the nurse to see whether it was fit for her young lady to eat. A bowl of rice was then presented to the bridegroom, placed on the bride's lap, to test her love for children. The bride and bridegroom were then formally formally introduced, in their new character, to every one of the company, the bride and husband on each side, the names being proclaimed by a herald or usher. This ceremony was not done, but the gentlemen and the wives at last permitted to retire. Large bowls of oil, with floating wicks, were placed between the married and the marriage bed, as a votive sacrifice to the deity on the nuptial night. The remainder of the feast, in large boxes or trunks, was deposited in one corner of the room, and the newly-married couple the newly wedded pair began to receive visits of social congratulation.

We believe the officers of the MANHATTAN to be honest and responsible, and their plan fairly to present their prospectus, to which we direct those contemplating such investments, very closely, to judge for himself.—N. Y. Tribune (Aug. 11). See Prospectus in next column.

MANHATTAN
CO-OPERATIVE
RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

OFFICE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
No. 423 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

THE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is chartered by the State of New York.

OBJECT.

The object of this plan of relief is to secure a cash payment within forty days after the death of a member of as many dollars as there are members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.

MEMBERSHIP FEES.

The membership fee is five dollars at joining (for which a policy will be furnished), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which due notice will be given. One dollar from each member pays to the heirs of the member of the deceased member, and the ten cents for the expenses of collecting.

INVESTMENTS.

The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the assets shall be invested in real estate in the City of New York, or in bond and mortgage on property in the City of New York, the interest of which shall go to pay the current expenses of the Association. If the Executive Committee leaves no heirs, the money becomes the property of the Association, with the proviso that the expenses of burial shall be paid out of such funds—and no more, however, not to exceed fifty dollars.

A member failing to pay his fee of one dollar and ten cents within thirty days from date of notice, forfeits all rights in the Association, and also forfeits all money previously paid. In the Pacific States this time is extended to sixty days. A member paying on permanent residence must notify the Secretary, and deposit a sum sufficient to cover his fee.

When members choose they can send ten dollars and fifty cents to the Secretary, and receive their fees, which sum will pay for ten deaths, thus saving the trouble of collecting for each time, besides a saving of fifty cents. No man is so poor that he can not pay ten cents a month, and no man is so rich as to refuse to be heirs. The average number of dollars each person in a class will be is the number will be $50 per year, or little over fifty cents per week. This makes this mode of insurance the cheapest in the world. No one will have to pay any regular Insurance Company for a less amount.

This company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women. As soon as ten members are filled ten new classes will be adopted. Men and women are not allowed in the same classes. Every thing is done to make each class equal.

EXAMPLE.

In class A all persons betw'n the ages of 18 and 20 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 20 and 25 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 25 and 30 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 40 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 45 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 50 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 55 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 60 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 65 yrs.

The classes for women are the same as above. Any one that is found to give his or her age wrong will be expelled, and will not be entitled to the Relief Association. Each class is limited to 5000 members. Each person pays $5 upon admission, and one and a 10 each time a member dies belonging to the same class he or she may be a member of.

A member of one class can not be assumed this dollar of a member of a different class. Each class is INDEPENDENT, having no connection with any other.

ILLUSTRATION.

Class "A" has 5000 male members. A man dies. The Association pays within forty days, $5000 to the widow or heirs, and the remaining members pay ten cents each, making $500, which is sent to the Association to reimburse it. Failing to send this sum forfeits all rights in the Association, and the money paid, and the Association supplies a new member to fill the place of the forfeiting one.

ADVANTAGES.

The advantages of this Association over ordinary Life Insurance Companies are, 1st, no pauses can break it: the fees are so small, and required to be paid at such long intervals, that no man can secure a large family a competency upon his death.

HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.

Any one desiring to become a member must send to the Secretary, by letter, mail order, or by messenger the expressage being paid by the applicant: Under no circumstances should the application be registered, as money sent but in this way. Agents are not allowed to receive money for fees, &c., &c., &c. Persons paying an agent otherwise than by check do so at their own risk. Checks, &c., must be payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

Address or name of person to be kept during the application of the doctor examining, the applicant is required to give his or her occupation, age, and complete address, town, county, state—also, a Medical Certificate of health, which will be furnished by the Secretary, and in the opinion of the doctor examining, the applicant is a proper person to become a member. The doctor's fee for examination of membership will be sent upon application for membership. Agents are not allowed to receive money but in the form of a check, draft, or postal order, made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

Each member ought to try to get ten more members; by so doing he pays his own fees. No letter will be noticed that does not contain a three-cent postage stamp for prepay ment of postage.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Tea and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Physical Exhaustion.

Worn out with the burning heats of summer, the human system requires to be restored and regenerated at this season. Strength has literally been steaming out of it under a temperature that necessarily produces exhaustion. Fall is the season of remittent and intermittent fevers, and the weak and enervated are always their first victims. Now, therefore, is the time for invigoration. Those who have neglected to build and regulate the digestive and secretive organs during the months of June and July, can no longer continue to do so without imminent peril to health and life. Commence a course of without delay. Of all renovating, strength-sustaining preparations, this is the most wholesome and the most genial. It does not unduly excite the most sensitive organization. Its mission is to preserve, regulate, and restore. The tonic, anti-bilious, and aperient vegetable elements which it contains are so distilled in the exact proportions necessary to put the whole physique into perfect working order. The purity of all its ingredients is guaranteed. It rouses the languid appetite, gives unwonted vigor to the digestion, calms and braces the nerves, and replaces lassitude and depression with energy and cheerfulness; besides being agreeable to the palate and free from all the objections urged against the adulterated stimulants and tonics, of which it is designed to supply the place.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an elegant watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ax. the express charges.

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them as Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that we do not use the Oroide case in any watches. Any representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

Oroide Jewelry.

We are now manufacturing OROIDE JEWELRY, of the latest and most approved styles. No gold jewelry, however high the price, surpasses this in beauty and elegance. In exquisite workmanship, durability, and in every respect excepting intrinsic value, it equals the best gold goods costing ten times as much.

Ladies' Sets of Pins and Ear-rings from $3 50 to $10; Ladies' Sets of Pins, Ear-rings, and Sleeve-Buttons, from $5 to $18; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Sleeve-Buttons, $1 50 to $3; Studs, $1 50 to $3. Every other kind of jewelry in the same proportion. All orders in sums of less than $5 must be accompanied with a Post-Office Order for the amount, to cover the money, and the goods will be sent by return mail. Send for price-list. Orders for $5 or more will be sent by express, to be paid for on delivery, customers paying express charges.

THE MOONSTONE.

A NOVEL.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "Armadale," "The Woman in White,' "No Name," "Antonina," "Queen of Hearts," &c., &c.

With many Illustrations.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00: Paper, $1 50.

* * The carefully-elaborate workmanship, and the wonderful construction of the story; the admirable manner in which each character is introduced and exhibited together, and the skill with which the secret is kept to the last: no trait, when all seems to have been discovered, there is a final light thrown upon people and things which gives a significance they never had not before.—London Athenæum.

The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are apt to be lost sight of in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought his ingenuity and his talent. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Review.

* * * Altogether The Moonstone is one of the most remarkable novels of the day. Its literary excellence being not the least of its many merits. * * * If any writer of the time possesses the faculty of interesting his readers in his work, it is Mr. Wilkie Collins. Indeed, he possesses it in so great a degree as to withdraw attention from other faculties of his, which are full as worthy of admiration. The man of his readers are so astounded at his skill in concocting and unraveling plots that they forget to observe his skill in delineating character. In The Moonstone the characters and the scenes through which they move are exceedingly life-like.—Albion.

OF

IN

THE UNITED STATES.

By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 906 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

From the Agent of the Massachusetts State Board of Education.

STATE HOUSE, BOSTON, August 18, 1868.

I have seen no other History of the Rebellion that seems to embrace so many admirable qualities as this does. I wish that so carefully prepared, beautifully illustrated, and reliable a History of our late Civil War might be placed in the library of every Grammar and High School and Academy in our country.

WATCHES, and ROSKOP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, stem to winding, silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has attracted universal attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the encomiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured by the Company, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A REMARKABLE NOVEL.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
Have just Published:

Love OR Marriage?

A NOVEL.

By WILLIAM BLACK.

8vo, Paper, Fifty Cents.

"'Love or Marriage?' is more striking, and its somewhat lurid moral coloring more true to life, than is at all usual in modern fiction. —Spectator.

It would do the novel much less than justice to call it clever and readable: it is full of spirit, power of conception and of description, well-wrought scenes, and excellent writing.—Illustrated London News.

There is a freshness and freedom from affectation about the manner of this book that is extremely captivating; and there is a courage combined with tenderness shown throughout, in a discussion of the deepest and most perilous of social perplexities, which is certain to win and to fix attention. . . Mr. Black has an excellent command of sound and pure idiom, great power of observation, and manifold resources of illustrative thought. It is a long time since we have read a story of every-day life with such unflagging interest.—Examiner.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review.

"'Love or Marriage?' is, in every sense, the composition of a cultivated mind; it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatic remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—Leader.

The story itself is interesting, thoroughly original, and not a little peculiar. There is a freshness and a vigor in the writing which contrast strongly and favorably with the ordinary novel. Mr. Black evidently has drawn his characters from life, and his scenes are no less real.—Public Opinion.

With rare fidelity, and with great graphic power, Mr. Black describes the scenes in the track of the Prussian army,.... Bright-er and more beautiful—almost perfect as a piece of descriptive writing—is that which describes Frank's journey. Not many men could have written this chapter.—Morning Star.

TOMB OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN AT OAK-RIDGE CEMETERY, SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.—SKETCHED BY F. D. SHIFF.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE TOMB OF LINCOLN.

IT is now three years and four months since our President, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, was brought to sudden death by the assassin's bullet. His death was the occasion of universal grief. His funeral procession from Washington to Springfield was the march of a conqueror, whose grand victory had been won. He was buried on a beautiful spring day in May, 1865, in the suburbs of Oak Ridge, Springfield. On our first page we give an illustration of the tomb which has been erected to his memory.

As we stand in the presence of this tomb we remember the first months of the secession movement—the violent threats of war uttered by the Southern branch of the Democratic party of these days—the open and deliberate plans of the newly-inaugurated President, which said to Southern Democrats, "If war must come now we but you are to be the aggressors." We remember the terrible struggle of four years, and how, when it was over and the people were uniting in anthems of praise to God for a Union restored, the cloud burst upon us, and we heard that our President had been murdered.

We do not forget that the violence of the Democratic press, which held up LINCOLN as a tyrant and a usurper, led to this tragedy. And if the assassin was urged on to his work by this partisan violence, it is now pretty clearly evident that Southern revolutionists have fully learned the lesson in which they had been instructed. They have come to understand what is meant by terrorism—to appreciate the use of the assassin's weapons. The investigation which has led to ASHDEN'S assassination fully sustains the charges made by Republicans, both as to the motives and the agents concerned in the murder. From every portion of the South we hear daily of the murder of loyal men. There are special organizations to carry on this bloody work. And these murderers are the allies of the Democratic party. As Mobile Democratic sheet explicitly declares that the Congressional plan of reconstruction shall be defeated, even if it should be necessary to resort to the dagger et al Eastern style in order to accomplish that result. Is it not time that this violence should be suppressed by the uprising of the people in their majesty, and by the repudiation of the party which threatens revolution in the event of its success, and war in the event of failure, and which courts the alliance of assassins?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1868.

ARE THEY FORGERIES?

THE New York World says: "The radical newspapers have forged speeches, and put them in the mouths of Southern Democrats by whom they were never uttered."

Is it a forgery that FRANK P. BLAIR, the Democratic candidate for Vice-President wrote to Colonel JAMES O. BRODHEAD on the 30th of June:

"There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President elect to declare these acts (of reconstruction) null and void, compel the army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments and elect Senators and Representatives?"

Is it a forgery that WADE HAMPTON said at a Democratic ratification meeting in New York:

"And I want you all to register an oath that when they ['the white people of the South' without regard to the enfranchisement of the reconstructed negro] vote, that these votes shall be counted, and if there is a majority of white votes that you will place hereon and BLAIR in the White House in spite of all the bayonets that shall be brought against them?"

Is it a forgery that WADE HAMPTON said at his reception in Charleston, that he proposed in the Committee on the Platform in the Democratic Convention to insert the words, "And we declare that the reconstruction acts are revolutionary, unconstitutional, and void?" and that he added:

"When I proposed that, every single member of the Committee—and the warmest men in it were the men of the North—came forward and said they would carry it out to the end?"

Is it a forgery that MR. C. C. LANGDON, delegate to the Democratic Convention, said in a published letter before the 4th of July, that the reconstruction measures are "unconstitutional and, of course, absolutely void," that this would be the chief plank in the Democratic platform; that the Supreme Court, probably at its next term, would so decide; and that he added:

"Then all we want is a President whose views are in accord with that decision, and who has the will and the nerve to do his duty. It will be his duty to enforce the decree of the Court, if need be, at the point of the bayonet?"

Is it a forgery that JOHN FORSYTH said, in the Mobile Register, speaking of reconstruction:

"And now we may as well say that the people of the South do not intend to submit to that permanent rule, result as the Presidential election may?"

Is it a forgery that RAPHAEL SEMMES said at Mobile:

"I have come to declare that I have given in my allegiance, heart and soul, to the old flag, provided we can restore the old flag again to be the representative of the principles of the Constitution, which we will be able to effect by the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR?"

Is it a forgery that the Charleston Mercury said:

"PEACE was made by General SUTTMAN in the spring of 1865, in his terms of capitulation with General JOHNSTON. That was peace, and nothing else ever will be peace?"

Is it a forgery that ALBERT PIKE said:

The South is our land; the North is a foreign and hostile realm . . . If the old Union cannot be restored, we will hope to see the South independent before we die?"

Is it a forgery that General BATTLE, of the late rebel army, said at the Democratic meeting in Mobile:

"The Democratic party indorses principles for which you battled?"

Is it a forgery that the Richmond Enquirer said:

"The next Democratic House of Representatives, in case of a contest, will recognize, and only recognize, such members as come there under legal considerations, and that have been adopted by the free consent of the white people of the States?"

Is it a forgery that the Richmond Whig, speaking of the BLAIR letter, said:

"He declared without any hesitancy, and in terms too clear and decided to be misunderstood, that, were he President, the whole Executive power should be brought to bear to blot out every vestige of Radical reconstruction?"

Is it a forgery that WADE HAMPTON said:

"Try to convince the negro that we are his real friends, but if he will not be convinced, and is still joined to his idols, convince him at least that he must not touch his idols, when he touches ours; he gets to feel and clothe him. Agree among yourselves, and act here by on the belief that you will not employ any one who is not the Radical ticket?"

Is it a forgery that ALBERT PIKE, as President of a Democratic club, officially said of Democratic cards of recommendation for colored men:

"We hope that hereafter, when any Democrat desires to employ a colored man in any capacity, he will ask to see his card, and if none is produced will refuse to employ him?"

Is it a forgery that the Chattanooga Union said:

"Suffer any and all taunts or tyranny until after November, and then—well, we would rather be a minority united than a white man divided."

Is it a forgery that the New York World said of such speeches of WADE HAMPTON as we have quoted:

"We have found them to be the candid and persuasive utterances of an honest and courageous man?"

And if these are all forgeries, why is it that the Chattanooga Mercury said:

"Private advices from our most strenuous friends at the North request that we should protest against the imputation of repentance which has escaped some Southern speakers since the adjournment of the National Democratic Convention. . . . It is questionable whether at this time any thing is to be gained by too much reference to things that jar on people's nerves. What we want just now is to win"?

If these are not forgeries they show distinctly that the policy of the Democratic party, should it succeed at the polls, will be the forcible overthrow of the governments of the Southern States. That will necessarily produce civil war.

THE FINANCIAL QUESTION.

THE responsibility for the debt we consider as resting with the Republican or Unionist party. Has the Republican party been in a disposition to increase or to diminish the national expenses? This is the real financial question of the campaign. The Republican party were compelled to make a debt to save the Government. The country of course means to pay it. It can not pay it, however, without taxation and without a spirit of economy in the manner which controls the Government. Yet even if that party evinced a recklessness that can not be proved against the Republicans, it by no means follows that the country would find relief by throwing itself into the hands of the Democrats, for reasons that we have suggested. What, then, are the facts?

The receipts for the last fiscal year were $406,300,000. What becomes of this great sum? The mass of it goes to pay the necessary debt. For interest, $141,635,551. For principal paid, $34,749,777. For bounties, pensions, and other war claims, $83,683,291. Here are about $260,000,000, including the cost of the Freedmen's Bureau and Reconstruction expenses. How could a Democratic administration reduce these expenses? The Bureau is now to end, and the Reconstruction measures have mainly ceased. Besides this sum, however, there are the ordinary expenses of the Government. The Civil list, the Interior, the War and Navy Departments, and the Engineer Bureau, all amounting to a little more than $146,686,000. This absorbs the revenue, and Senator SHERMAN, who is specially conversant with financial matters in Congress, says: "I can not recall a single item of appropriation, except for the President's Bureau and Reconstruction, that was not supported by all parties, both in the Senate and House."

But Congress has materially lightened the expenses. It opposed the enormous pressure for extra civil and military pay, involving millions of dollars. It has abolished that temporary but most indispensable institution, the Freedmen's Bureau. Nothing has been more malignantly opposed by the rebels and Copperheads than the Bureau, because nothing tended more to secure finally and absolutely the victory of the war. The Democratic orators have made the loosest statements of the enormous expenses of the Bureau, devoted, they declare, to the support of lazy able negroes. Mr. W. VOORHEES lately asserted that it spent for that purpose ten or fifteen millions a year. The truth is, according to General HOWARD, the unimpeachable chief of the Bureau, that, deducting the pay and allowances of army officers and the commissary stores from army depôts, the total actual cost of the Freedmen's Bureau has been less than six millions of dollars. It has been no less the friend of the poor white than of the poor blacks, and its service to the country has been of the noblest and most invaluable character. In the other departments of the Government there has been a similar reduction, so that the appropriations for ordinary purposes will probably have fallen from $146,000,000 to $91,000,000. With all the drawbacks the expenses of the Government this year will not exceed $100,000,000, exclusive of the public debt and bounties and pensions.

Now, how is the money raised for these expenses? In other words, what is our system of taxation? The subject was comparatively new to us, and we began with a cumbrous compilation, levying taxes upon a multitude of articles with the aim of equalization. Gradually, however, the system becomes simple. The taxes on liquors and tobacco, the necessaries of life have been repealed, and upon manufactures except spirits and tobacco. But the customs duties are laid upon imported goods, and yield about $180,000,000. The taxes on spirits and tobacco have yielded as much as $55,000,000 in a year. But the frauds were so enormous that the rate was reduced, and a return of $100,000,000 from these two sources is now estimated. There are besides these the income tax on all incomes over $1000; the license tax; the stamp tax; the tax on all articles and other corporations, and miscellaneous duties upon such articles as billiard tables, carriages, and plate. The expenses of collecting the internal revenue have been less than three and one per cent., which is a smaller rate than that of customs collection, or of any local State or city tax in the country.

This may not be a perfect system of taxation. But it is constantly tested by experience, and is rigorously modified to meet the necessities of the country. The Democracy, who so vehemently denounce the tax-gatherer, proposed any method more effectual? Looking at the whole subject, is it the Democratic party likely to stop the visits of the collector except by refusing to pay him? If the party of which the Southern chiefs have again taken the command should succeed at the polls, will it probably insist upon paying the cost of suppressing the rebellion and decline to consider the pensions of rebel soldiers and compensation for rebel losses? Certainly not. It will either refuse to pay the whole; or it will stand by its platform and repudiate the whole.

CONGRESS AND THE SOUTHERN VOTE.

THE frank declarations of the leading Southern Democrats that they considered vote unexpected or coaxed for SEYMOUR and BLAIR—the system of certificates which decrees starvation against any colored laborer who can not prove his Democracy; the thoroughly aroused rebel spirit which haughtily declares that it supports the Democratic candidates, because their success will practically blot out the reconstruction; the terrorism which is already directed against known Union men; the constant murders without punishment; and the total want of an organized militia—place the alarming situation of the Southern States beyond question.

There is a general demand from loyal men in those States for the assembling of Congress in September, to provide for the arming of a loyal militia. The late correspondence upon the subject of the raid of the Marshal to call upon the United States troops shows how very slow any such remedy would be; and without the moral support from the country the consciousness of an efficient military force immediately available it is not to be expected that the loyal Union vote can be generally polled.

The objection to the assembling of Congress seems to be that many of the members are needed upon the stump. But the work could be very soon done, and the votes now necessary to complete it would probably be quite as serviceable to the cause as the speeches that might be made elsewhere during the time. The only really valid objection would be an evident want of time to pass proper laws, and perfect organization under them, between the 21st of September and the election. But that must have been considered when the resolution was taken to adjourn to that date, or there is a very serious responsibility upon the Republican majority. The Southern States are the weak point of the campaign, for there the probability of a fair expression of the will of the lawful voters is smallest. The Democrats do not mean that the lawful voters shall prevail, but that "the white vote" shall be known at all events. What we all have a right to demand is that there shall be as fair a lawful vote as possible. Under the circumstances as they now appear that is not to be expected; and Congress, which is responsible for the want of a proper militia organization in those States, is morally bound to do what it can to secure a fair election.

TAXATION.

MR. SEYMOUR says in his letter of acceptance: "The hours of toil of our laborers are lengthened by the costs of living made by the direct and indirect exactions of Government. Our people are harassed by the hearry and frequent demands of the tax-gatherer." MR. PENDLETON asks at Bangor: "Why is it that your taxes consume such an enormous amount of your yearly supply?" The lesser orators of the party repeat the assertion and the question. "We are taxed," they say, "to the highest extent. If we did but know it, we are the most oppressed and tax-ridden people in the world." And having exhausted epithets in describing taxation, having made the most astounding misrepresentations of the expenses of the Government, and carefully refrained from proposing any financial policy except that of Jeremy Diddler, they propose a panacea for the national suffering in the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR.

Now the financial debt is undoubtedly large, and the burden upon the tax-payers is heavy. Yet, in proportion to the national resources, it is much smaller than the present debt of France, and is not a third of that of England in 1816. But in considering a debt and relief from it sensible men look first at its origin, in order to determine whether those who administer the Government now have the charge of such a responsibility for the debt; and, secondly, at the character of those who denounce it as a means of bringing themselves into power, and at the general policy that they advocate. Pursuing this course, we find that our debt of $2,500,000,000 is the price of our continued national existence, which is necessary to our individual welfare. The debt is the cost of defending the Government against the bloody and desperate and prolonged assault of those who now aspire to control it. To subdue MR. WADE HAMPTON and his legion, for instance, probably cost the Government more than a million of dollars. In the Democratic reconstruction, protested so pathetically against the enormity of taxation, there were scores of ex-rebel officers—civil and military, who were individually chargeable with several millions of the debt. To suppress their insurrection the debt was incurred. Twenty-five hundred millions of dollars is the price of the Union that we have maintained, of the cancer of slavery that we have cut out, of the commanding position and vast influence among nations that we have won, and of the substantial principles of a Government that we have vindicated and are vindicating. This is the origin of the debt, and it can not be forgotten.

Is the Republican party justly responsible for it? The rebellion was plotted under a Democratic President. Its chiefs were Democratic cabinet officers, Democratic senators, Democratic governors and judges. It was sustained in arms by Democrats; Democrats did their utmost to paralyze the Government in the contest. The Democratic Congress hindered the efforts of the Government futile, and demanded surrender to the rebellion. And now that the chiefs of the rebellion, waged by the arms and prolonged by the sympathy chiefly of adherents and leaders of the Democratic party, has been subdued, those leaders step forward, denounce the debt which they compelled the country to incur, and demand the control of the Government which they could not overthrow.

What, then, are the promises under which the demand is made? Are they such as reasonably to justify the expectation of a return of that public confidence without which prosperity and relief from taxation will be indefinitely postponed? The policy announced by the Democratic party by which to pacify the country and reduce the Union is revolution and repudiation. It is distinctly declared by the candidates and the leaders that the present organizations of the Southern States are void; and that the most unqualified recognition they ought to be at once forcibly overthrown by the President secured for the candidate who made it an enthusiastic nomination. This policy, which the framers of the platform generally agreed to carry out to the end, can be carried out only by involving the States concerned in anarchy. Congress and the people, and the Supreme Court will sustain one of the governments; the Democratic President will support the other. In the nature of things compromise will be impossible. The difference will be referred to force. Is another civil war the way to relieve taxation?

The other point of the proposed Democratic policy is repudiation. The public demonstration that would follow is incalculable. It would be poison at the very sources of the national life. It would properly make this country a despised outcast among nations. We should be a society of swindlers, and the whole glory of our victory over the rebellion would be fatally tarnished by our voluntary dishonor. The rebel chiefs would have the exultation of beholding the disgrace of the people whom they could not defeat. To them the satisfaction would be the same. They are indifferent whether they humiliate us by arms or by arts. But the moral character of every public question is its really essential part. On the industrial ruin, like the political demoralization, consequent upon repudiation is inconceivable. Already the actual loss to the country from the mere suspicion of a possible intention to repudiate may be estimated at millions of dollars. Such a suspicion is a shock to the public credit which is felt through the whole system, and every dollar which it thus loss is taken from the means with which the pressure of the debt is to be relieved. In public as in private affairs, honesty is the best policy. The man who to relieve present necessity becomes a thief must not hope to be received among honorable men. But a man whom honorable men despise can hardly make an honest living. Is national dishonesty the way permanently to relieve taxation?

The whole matter comes then to this—that the party whose rebellion against the Government caused the debt now, as a means of obtaining control of the Government, denounces the taxation necessary to pay it. According to the Democratic oracles the Republican party is three times guilty: first, of not submitting to rebellion; second, of suppressing it by arms; third, of not being honest to foot the bill of expenses. "Heavy and frequent demands for tax-gatherer!" "Enormous amount" of taxation! about Messrs. SEYMOUR, PENDLETON, VALLANDIGHAM, WADE HAMPTON, and their friends. Mr. HAMPTON, if you had not taken up arms against a Government that never injured you; Mr. SEYMOUR and Mr. PENDLETON, if you had not assisted Mr. JEFF. DAVIS to set up, back, the taxes would neither have been frequent nor enormous, and your names would not be those of willing witnesses of their country's destruction.

WHY WALL STREET IS DULL.

The brokers of Wall Street are complaining that they never knew so dull a season as the summer of 1868. Though the rate of interest has been unusually low, accumulations of capital enormous, and the traffic on the railways large, the business in stocks has not been more than half that of last summer, or one quarter that of the palmy days of 1863 and 1864. Why is this? Is the gambling instinct dying out? Have people got over the desire to make sudden fortunes on the days of exchange? Or have the leading operators of the street, in an insane greed for inordinate profits, held the common-sense of the public too cheap, and killed the goose that laid golden eggs?

In olden times, when a man proposed to speculate in Wall Street, he bought one or more hundred shares of stock, if he deemed it low, then awaited events; if his calculation was correct, the stock rose, and he sold out at a profit; if his calculation was incorrect, the stock fell, and he sold out or was sold out by his broker at a loss. Nowadays speculation is different. A party or clique of wealthy operators combine together to buy not a few hundred or thousand shares, but the whole stock of a given stock; their theory is, that, after having secured control of the stock, they will elect themselves directors, appoint their friends and relatives to the offices, cause the price of the stock to advance by shrewd manipulations, then sell out to the public at the advance. Nothing can be prettier than such a scheme; nothing more rife with unlimited command of money, than the accomplishment of the first four steps in the programme; nothing more profitable, provided the last step can be achieved, and the public persuaded to buy the stock from the clique at the advance. It is just possible, however, to underrate the common sense of people at times. The public is stupid, probably; but there are some baits too gross even for its stupidity. As a general rule, it does certainly prefer to buy stocks when they are dear rather than when they are cheap; but there is a limit to its credulity, and if cliques are too greedy, and want to make too much money, the public is apt to stand aloof and refuse to trade altogether.

This is what has happened this summer. Last winter and spring wealthy combinations of operators secured control of nearly all the leading stocks—New York Central, Michigan Southern, Cleveland and Pittsburg, Fort Wayne, St. Paul, and Rock Island. At the annual elections the new proprietors elected themselves directors of their respective railroads, and appointed their friends and relatives to the offices. Next for very plausible manipulations, they forced up the market-price of the stocks they held some ten or fifteen per cent. Thus far all went well. The cliques appeared to have made—on paper—very large profits. All that was necessary to crown the operation with success was to realize the last step in the programme, and sell out to the public at the advance. There was a hitch here.

For, at the very first attempt to market their stocks, the cliques discovered that the public would not buy. Glowing newspaper articles dinned on the heavy railroad earnings and the brilliant crop prospects. They fell perfectly flat. The brokers had no orders, and Broad Street was quiet as a country meeting-house. A dull and dogged public would not take the stocks at the advance. Then the cliques, in June, 1867, was pronounced by its Directors dear at 67, should be cheap, in June, 1868, at 87; or that Northwestern, which, in 1866, was considered inflated at 40, should now be worth 70; or that New York Central, which, in the hands of the most experienced railway men in the country, has averaged par, should now be a purchase at 125. There was no use arguing the question. The public could no more be moved than the Stock Exchange building itself.

Baffled at first sight, the clique-leaders now set to work to convince the public that it was wrong, and that their stocks were really cheap. The first step to do this was to pay dividends. There was a trifling difficulty in the way. They had no money to divide. But they had control of their own stock books; so they printed off a quantity of new stock, and issued it gratis to their stockholders, and called it a dividend. Now, said they to the public, see what you have made! The managers thus have been acting famously, but the stocks were duller than ever. What was to be done? As a last desperate resource, cash dividends were declared on Michigan Southern and Pittsburg. Of course the companies had no cash to divide. The Pittsburg Company was then, and is now, selling 7 per cent. mortgage bonds at par to count in a 4 per cent. money-market to provide means to equip and repair its road. The Michigan Southern, only last year, nearly defaulted on its interest; and since the increase in its earnings has been trifling. Still, money could be borrowed; borrowed it was, and the dividends duly paid. A new source of pleasantry the Michigan Southern dividend being the first for four years, was called "semi-annual; while the Pittsburg dividend, being the first for two years, was denominated "quarterly." Will it be believed that even this bait failed to arouse the public? Such, alas! was the case. There was, literally, no public inquiry for the stocks after than before the dividend. Every resource had now been exhausted. The money-market, the traffic on the roads, the temper of the public, had been in favor of the cliques, and yet, here were autumn and a stringent money-market at hand, and they actually held more stocks than they had held in May.

If any man, outside or inside of the cliques, gravely wonders at this result, let him, first, do the public the justice to believe that, stupid as it may be, it is not wholly idiotic; and secondly, let him compare the present prices of stocks (adding thereto the dividends just declared) with the same prices for the past ten years. The following table tells the story:

Stocks.	Present Price.	Usual Price.	Advance Asked.
New York Central	120	100	$20
Michigan Southern	90	70	20
Cleveland & Pittsburg	70	60	10
North-western	70	39	31
Do. Preferred	69	91	21
Rock Island	98	85	13
Fort Wayne	95	111	16
St. Paul	60	40	20

Be it remarked that these "usual" prices are not panic prices, but fair averages for the past ten years. Within the events of this time stocks have sold, in panics, $15 @ $20 below these "usual" prices. Was it reasonable on the part of the cliques to expect the public, merely because the money-market was easy, and the roads doing well for the time, to forget that whenever in the past ten years stocks had for a season been pushed up above their usual rates they had soon afterward receded below them?

Again, was it doing justice to public common-sense, poorly as the cliques may think of it, to overlook the fact that the events of the past year have almost destroyed confidence in railway investments? The year 1867 ended in a Wall Street panic caused by the discovery of the fact that one of the most esteemed companies, the Chicago and Rock Island, had surreptitiously issued and sold in open market five millions of new stock. A month later the financial community was again shocked to learn that the Directors of the Rock Island had fled the State, carrying with them their stock and their money, and had procured an act from the Iowa Legislature postponing indefinitely the election of Directors in that Company. A couple of months later followed the surreptitious issue and sale of ten millions of Erie stock, under circumstances so barefaced and shameful as to disgrace the whole community in which such crimes could be perpetrated. And it is with these scandalous transactions, fresh in every man's memory, that the cliques of 1868 expect a confiding public to buy their stock at thirty per cent. advance over the old average!

If any man wants to know where this state of things will end, let him study the history of the past. Nothing is new under the sun. This is not the first time that oversanguine men have undertaken bold enterprises, in ignorance of the laws of trade, and in a somewhat contemptuous misapprehension of the commonsense of the public. Such men, when disappointment overtakes them, often struggle hard and manfully against inevitable disaster. But the end comes, for all their struggles, sooner or later, and values, like water, find their level at last.

THE TRUE DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINE.

The spirit of the Southern Democrats, by whom the Democratic managers now hope to carry the election, may be seen in the following extract from the Mobile Register, an ardent supporter of SEYMOUR and BLAIR. It was those men, according to their leader ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, were trying to establish an empire on the corner stone of slavery who were fighting for human liberty, and the Government of the United States was the tyrant hostile to freedom. We have not seen a better exposition of the true Democratic doctrine of which SEYMOUR and BLAIR are the representatives:

"Abraham Lincoln, the 'Copperhead' has lost half of his odium in the Northern public mind, and 'rebel' is getting to be understood as an armed protest against the tyranny of the Federal power to human freedom, as it was at open war with the Constitution of the United States. The people of the North understand that the South never did or mean to 'rebel' against either the Union or the Constitution of the United States, but only against a faction, in whose hands both were in peril of destruction. The Confederate States bore the old Constitution with them, and set it up on their own altars, for a purer, holier, and safer worship. And finally, yet with tears, they sank, amid ruin, through fire and blood, saved the Constitution, and enabled the nation in the fullness of time to vindicate and reenthrone it in their hearts, and again plant it upon the altars of a common country."

POISONED MEATS

It is very amusing to see the Democrats trying to wheedle the colored vote. At a late Barbecue at Little Rock, in Arkansas, the Democratic Committee placarded the attractive bill through the neighborhood: "Come one! Come all! Both White and Black! As the infamous lie is in circulation that the meats for colored persons will be poisoned, we mail that Radical trick to the counter by offering choice of tables to white and black, and we will divide places with them." Dividing places we understand to mean occupying alternate seats, which shows a degree of gallantry that was not to be expected, and which is, at least, suspicious by sudden. This conversion of the Arkansas Democracy is peculiarly Providential, for on the 11th of last August, when the Convention in that State declared first, for "A white man's government in a white man's country;" second, "The transport of the negro for self-government;" and, third, for "The exclusion of negroes from an equal participation in making the laws, and from the rights and privileges of social equality."

We trust that our friends in the Southern States will show to the colored voters in the plainest manner, that politically speaking, the Democratic party has not got hold of the black hand to cut the black throat with it. They want black votes to help them into power that they may rule over white. Let our friends then invite the colored voters to meditate the words of the Charleston Mercury, a distinguished Democratic authority, which asks whether "South-ern men" are to be driven at will by negro slaves; "to be domineered over by black barbarians; to be legislated out of their property by ignorant asses?" While the News of the Richmond Enquirer, equally Democratic and authoritative: "This was intended to be, and must always remain, a white man's government. None but white men must vote or hold office." Of these of the Mobile Register, no less Democratic and representative, which describes the "negro vote" as a "base and servile mob, and a sum of calamities," and begs the Democratic party not "to send the army down to settle our domestic disputes, and turn the scale in the contest of white men with black men!"

If the opinion upon this subject of conspicuous individual Democrats is desired, let the colored voters be reminded of the speech of Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS at the SEYMOUR and BLAIR ratification meeting at Atlanta, in which he describes the Georgia Legislature as "two hundred and twenty very respectable gentlemen, leaving out the kinker-heads (laughter), the honor of whose acquaintance I have not, my association not having in that direction just at present, not having qualified (laughter)." Or the equally dignified and honorable remarks of Mr. HOWELL COBB: "Tell them that you have seen the poor, ignorant, debased, unhappy, unfortunate, and deluded nigger taken, not by the voice of persuasion and of argument . . . to fill up the ballot-box that formerly received the votes of the good and true men of Georgia." Or the declaration of Senator HENDRICKS, of Indiana: "We meet the question squarely; we are against negro suffrage." Or the observations of the New York Democratic Review, true-blue Democrat: "Nobody but a restless fanatic ever doubted that the negro is a natural barbarian; that in his own tropical home he never rises above cannibalism and frequent holocausts of human sacrifices." And it adds, speaking not of FORREST, QUANTRELL, and their companions, but of those who, when their masters were away to fight to keep them in hopeless slavery, spared the homes those masters left: "Their instinctive relish for carnage and blood-thirsty ferocity will assert itself whenever proper opportunity offers."

In consideration of this universal and traditional Democratic contempt, slander, and derision of the colored race, perhaps the "choice of tables" or even the offer "to divide places" will not be very selective to the new voters. And, upon the whole, they may very naturally suppose, despite the assurance of the Committee, that the meats are poisoned.

ELLIOTT, THE ARTIST.

The loss of Mr. ELLIOTT, the artist, is sincerely deplored, not only by his personal friends, but by all who knew him. He was a man of the truest modesty and simplicity of nature, and the most delicate sense of humor that was very delightful and endearing. Always underrating, he was not personally widely known, but his works, his portraits, are familiar to every body. They have a vigor, truth, and freedom, and delicacy, which always distinguish them, and the likeness is always curiously felicitous. Born in the centre of the State, he never left it more than thirty years had been chiefly in this city from which he strayed upon his professional errands. For the last two or three years, however, he had resided at Albany, where he died. Every day he is gone, the seal of silence upon friendly and loving lips has been broken, and those who have the best right to speak of him, speak with the sincerest admiration and affection of his personal qualities. The interest of the public, however, is mainly with his works, and that interest will be lasting. Of all the fraternity of artists, none was more generally beloved by his fellows than ELLIOTT; and the work of none will be more missed than his upon the walls of the Academy.

THE DIFFICULTY WITH GRANT.

The Democrats having accused General GRANT of every mean and malignant villainy possible, now allege that he was really responsible for the unpardonable atrocities of the Andersonville pen. This they do upon the authority of a most appropriate ally, ROBERT OULD, the rebel Commissioner of Exchange. The Union Commissioner, General MEREDITH, has, however, restated the terrible truth of the matter.

Why do not the Democrats declare the real secret of their hostility to General GRANT, that he compelled LEE to surrender?

ANOTHER WITNESS.

A private letter to us from Alabama says:

"What I consider first, and most to be deplored, in the universal proscriptive policy the South is again adopting in order to make sure and unscrupulous subservient to their will in the canvass now going on for the Presidency and Congress. Individuals and agents are freely used; news-venders are cautioned against selling papers and pamphlets that contain views that differ from the prevailing rebel sentiment of the place, for that sin is over of the Republican creed. . . . Eighteen months ago the local papers advised the newsvenders to sell the Tribune, Times, Evening Post, and Weekly; and for my expostulating with them on the inconsistency of such advice I was warned that I was severely assailed in print . . . I will soon leave for my home in Ohio, for I find I can not exercise my reason in the South, and over three years here at Mobile and I shall lovingly bless the Government more odious now than, on the first day I landed in DIXIE."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

In Vermont the State election is being held as we go to press. Last year the Republican majority was 20,000; in 1866 nearly 22,000. A Republican gain in the election will be a very decisive indication of a Republican victory in November. The election in California takes place September 7th. The State is like a tail until the 14th, when Maine will speak. In October elections will be held in Pennsylvania, Iowa, Ohio, Indiana, and West Virginia.

Secretary McCulloch and Comptroller Rollins have made a correspondence in regard to revenue arrangements, which are to be carried out by Assistant Assessors two months.

General Rosecran's Sulphur Springs mission resulted in nothing more than a correspondence between him and prominent Confederates, showing that the feeling of the great body of our resident fellow-citizens would probably be prohibitive. It is a trivial circumstance any way. The questions of the campaign are too profound for either General Rosecrans or General Lee to decide safely. The people will decide them in November.

Secretary Seward has gone on the north-east; but General Sherman is equal to the emergency. He has virtually declared them under martial law.

CAMP-MEETING AT MARTHA'S VINEYARD.

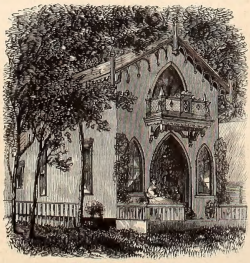
MARTHA'S VINEYARD is celebrated for its camp-meetings. Its location is peculiarly adapted to those who desire to mingle their holiday summer excursions with healthy spiritual enjoyment.

The Tribune correspondent thus describes the locality, and the means of reaching it:

"A sail of three hours takes you from the quaint little city of New Bedford, across Buzzard's Bay and Vineyard Sound, to Martha's Vineyard. If you must economize your time or money, or if there are ladies in your company, you will take the little steamboat which makes daily trips to the various towns along the Bay and Sound; but if there are no such overruling obstacles, a much better way will be to get a sail-boat at New Bedford and spend half a day on the excursion, cruising around the Elizabeth Islands, which lie between New Bedford and the Vineyard, and separating the Bay from the Sound.... A mile or thereabouts south of Holmes Hole, on the northeast shore of the island, is the grove in which the Wesleyan Methodists for many years past have been accustomed to hold one of the most remarkable camp-meetings in America. They first assembled here for prayer in 1835, and, except one brief interval, they have met here annually ever since, though it is only within the last six or seven years that their gatherings in this spot have acquired a national importance."

The daily attendance last year was 10,000; and this year it is probably greater, as not only New England but the Middle States contribute to the gathering. The camp is in a beautiful grove of scrub-oaks, washed on two sides by the sea, with a salt-water pond in its rear, into which the sea flows at high-tide over a narrow strip of beach. The grounds, including 150 acres, are owned by an association of Methodists, who have been offered a charter by the Massachusetts Legislature. There are over 200 cottages on the ground, one-fourth of which have been erected during the present summer. "In front," says the correspondent from whom we have already quoted, "there is a pretty little veranda, and three or four feet of garden may be fenced in before it. Over the front-door there is generally a balcony. The high-peaked roofs, the balconies, the door and window frames, are all decorated with scroll-work; stained glass, silver doorplates, hanging lanterns, and other luxuries are beheld at every turn; the houses are gayly painted, the verandas bloom with rare flowers, the little miniature yards are decked with moss and shell-work, and under the trees, which cast a thick shade over all, are rustic benches and swings for the children." Besides the cottages there are over 400 tents.

These thousands of people who frequent Martha's Vineyard at this season have more and fresher pleasures than those who summer at Newport or Long Branch. Here you see the latest fashions, and innocent flirtation is not unknown among the lads and lassies. They play croquet. Just below the steamboat landing there is a beach for bathing. And then there is fishing and sailing for those who are fond of aquatic sports, several good sail-boats being always at anchor off the pier. When evening sets in the girls put away their croquet and attend to the tea-making; then comes the evening service around the cottage doors, while outside the young people are promenading in the gayly lighted streets of this improvised village. The utmost care is taken by the Committee of Regulations to prevent fire, and all smoking is forbidden in the tents.



Our artist, Mr. SHEPPARD, has seized upon some of the most picturesque features connected with this beautiful camp. The daily services began on the 24th of August.

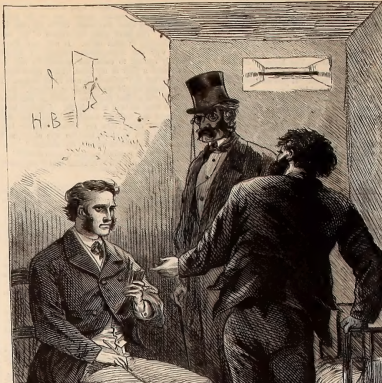
INDUSTRIAL FAIR BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Industrial Fair at San Francisco promises to be the largest and most successful one ever held on the Pacific coast. We give below an illustration of the building in which it is to be held, which is situated on Union Square, covering nearly two-thirds of the entire square. On the Stockton Street front two pillars stand 80 feet high, flanking the main entrance. In the rear of these is the main pavilion, or hall, which is 288 feet length of roof, with nave of same length, 80 feet wide, and 63 feet high (average), with wings 50 feet wide and 272 feet long—the roof, where it joins the nave, being 40 feet high and sloping to 28 feet at the eaves. Around the entire nave runs a gallery for promenade purposes, which is 9 feet wide and 14 at end, where staircases descend on each side to the main floor. The Art Gallery is 205 feet long by 30 wide. The various artists of San Francisco have largely engaged space for the exhibition of their works. The especial object of the Fair is to exhibit California products and manufactures, including wines as a prominent feature. Sixteen gold and fifty-six silver medals will be awarded.

THE LAWYER'S STORY.



IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

To recover a child for a father who had been the seducer of the mother, for this, in fact, was the sum of all this story, was a task that I did not covet. Besides this it was totally out of the line of professional employment. But he did not ask this. He, in fact, only asked a friend, and friendly counsel. And when I had penetrated the folds of his mind, and learned that under that strange, wild garb was a warm heart yearning to atone to the dead mother, the early dead, for all the wrongs he had brought on her, and to obey her dying command to take care of her child, that child whose name with his own formed the last sweet sounds of those beloved lips, sounds that yet lingered in all the air that he breathed in all countries and at all times, I began to be ready to assist him in accomplishing this desire; and at length, promising him my aid as it might be from time to time available, I left my new friend to his lonesome house.

The incidents in this story are hardly to be considered professional incidents. They rather came to my knowledge in a professional capacity, and it is for this reason that I have chosen to relate them as a lawyer's story. My own connection with the incidents was from time to time during a period of several years after this.

I did not at first direct any special attention to the matter. But at Mr. Ashmun's request I examined the will of Henry Gordon, which was proved in the Surrogate's office in New York city. It was in some respects curious, and I was led by its examination to look into the state of his property at the time of his death. A series of discoveries, which it is not necessary to recite here, induced me to believe that he had property in —— County. Among other items I learned that a lawyer named Whitstone, a resident of that county, had transacted his business, and was in fact the confidential friend and adviser of both the brothers. On directing a search to the clerk of —— County I had returned a trust deed, executed by Gordon to this same Whitstone, for the settlement of a small income on Stephen Gray, the brother of the father of Eve, wife of Henry Gordon. I had learned that her parents were dead before her departure with Ashmun, and that they had died leaving no property. This trust deed was dated about a year after the disappearance of the younger Eve. At Ashmun's urgent solicitation I consented to go up to —— County to see Stephen Gray and make some inquiries there. But the autumn day on which I rode into the little village of —— was unpropitious for my inquiries.

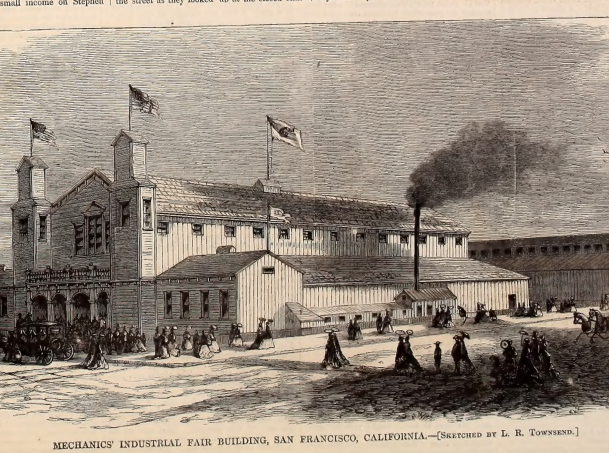
"WE ACCORDINGLY PREPARED FOR HIS TRIAL IMMEDIATELY," ETC.

Stephen Gray was dying! So said the boys in the street as they looked up at the closed shutters of his window, where they were used to see his face on a pleasant morning in the springtime, where he was wont to sit and watch them on the shady sidewalk as they passed along to the door of the school-house. For thirty years now had the old man occupied that room and taught the village boys and maidens their first steps toward knowledge. The humble schoolmaster's influence had already been world-wide, and he was proud of his life—as proud as any statesman of his hard-earned laurels or his achieved triumph. For had he not heard of his boys in many lands? Was not the finest book on his table a volume written by one whom he had taught till he went to college, and did not the first page of the book contain a testimony of the boy's love and loving remembrance? And had not Stephen Gray been named in the halls of learning, and even in the national Congress? There was a worn old newspaper in his drawer, carefully preserved, wherein was a report of the speech of his most brilliant scholar; and he had read over and over the passage in which the orator told the men of his nation that those were the principles he learned from his schoolmaster in the up-country.

Peacefully had Stephen Gray labored, and after working well it appeared now that the time was come when he might take his rest. He felt that he needed it, and was not unwilling to lie down. The school-house was open yet, but the boys were not called in; and the village girls gathered for a little while each morning at their school-room, and wept while Susan Gray told them of the old man.

Gentle Susan Gray! The memory of her winning loveliness comes back like a breeze of spring on a summer's day. She was a slender girl, with dark brown hair and dark blue eyes. Her cheeks were of the peach hue that is softest and most beautiful, while her chin and forehead were rounded in that perfection of contour which we sometimes see in the old paintings of Saint Cecilia. She was not called beautiful, but very, very lovely. The boys loved her in her girlhood. The young men loved her in her maidenhood. The children looked fondly and smilingly up at her in the street; and the old men blessed her for an angel, as she was, flitting across their dim visions. But she had not smiled now for seven days. Just so long had Stephen Gray been lingering where the roads parted, uncertain which to take. And now he was no longer hesitating or doubtful, but was passing swiftly by the dark road of death.

The light in the room was very dim, for the heavy wooden shutters were closed. Only a ray streamed through a crescent-shaped orifice and fell on the carpet near the side of the bed on which lay the giant form of the schoolmaster. His eyes were closed, but the occasional twitching, convulsive movement of his lips indicated painful thoughts. His grandchild knelt by a chair at the head of the bed. Old Mr. Johnson, the clergyman, stood on his left. Mrs. Duncan, the Scotch lady with whom he had lived for two-score years, was at the foot of the bed. Mrs. Whitney, the best friend of Susan Gray, sat on the right side of the old man and held one of his wasted hands in hers.



"My little one," murmured the thin lips of the dying schoolmaster.

Susan sprang to his side, and as his eyes opened they rested on that countenance with a joy that seemed to shine out of them, as if he fancied he were already looking into the face of a seraph.

"My little one, my darling bird, the old man's hour has come; and before the sun shines on the grave of my son under the church wall I shall be with him in the quiet places of the better country."

There was a quaintness in the expression which reminded all of them that the old man's love of quiet was with his teacher when he thought of heaven.

"Dear Susy, come closer to me while I whisper to you. I had a dream just now. I thought I was with him and with mother. She was not old nor sad-eyed nor feeble, but she was young and fair as in the good days of our youth, and she was bright-eyed and shining as the people of that country all are; and while I looked at her I awoke, and your face was over mine, and oh, how like to her face both here in the old time end there in my dream! You are beautiful, my little child, and yet the day will come when your beauty will be dust, and those dear tresses that lie now on the old man's cheek will be hidden out of sight. But what grand times we will have then, my Susy, in the good country! Heaven is close to us, dear, and I am stepping now across its borders. Yet this was heaven, too, and the faces around me were pleasant and—and—and—"

"Susan," said the old man, after a long pause.

"Susan, the boys have been here this morning again, have they not? I am glad the boys love me. It is pleasant to die out of a place where one is loved, and I am in a place where all is love. Love—love! Yes, I thank God for the hope, through Jesus Christ our Lord!"

The voice of the teacher grew strong and bold as he uttered the last words, and he lifted himself in his bed. "Open the shutter a little more, if you please, Mrs. Duncan."

The beautiful light flushed his face with unwonted radiance, and he gazed out of the window at the roofs of the public school-house, which stood next to his own, and at the elm-tree which hung over it. The first frost had touched the leaves, and some of them were falling. A group of boys stood near the door, looking sadly up at the shutters as they were thrown open. The old man knew them all by their names, though he did not see them, but he thought and thought till his brain ached with his sorrow.

"Oh, I shall see them again! I am sorrowful exceedingly, now; for I am leaving all that I love, and when shall we meet again? There, at the door, is what his weakness was somewhat childish, he changed suddenly, and exclaimed, somewhat harshly, "Close the shutters—close them right. Let no earthly light come across my vision. That single gleam effaced all the joy my dream had left me!"

For an hour after that he lay silent, but there was a visible alteration in his appearance. His features assumed an unnatural look, and his hands were agented from time to time, but evidently without seeing. Then he began to murmur something at first indistinctly, but at length in a clear full voice, and they recognized passages of Holy Writ. But, as he continued, his voice began to break. His consciousness evidently began to possess, opened his eyes, and stared fixedly at Susan, muttered: He changed my countenance and sent me away. Then he rose and raised his head for a moment to the head of the fair girl, and he sought to bless her with his last words, but his utterance failed him, and from that hour he was gone to his wife, and was at rest in a quiet place.

I remained at —— three days, and saw Stephen Grier's remains consigned to the earth which he had walked so many years. During these days I had not been idle in my inquiries about the murder, but I found that all search resulted in but one end, to wit, the necessity of consulting Winthrose, the lawyer who had been the adviser of both the murderers.

He was an old practitioner, sharp at times as an axe newly ground, and I have usually found that that sort of lawyers were very much like the axe in its liability to have its edge turned or broken by contact with any hard substance that resists a little. But I am of the opinion that a class of lawyers whose name is legion, whose professional triumphs are on technicalities, and with whom the perfection of legal acumen is in taxing long bills of costs, or in defending criminals charged with petty larceny.

I found the man in a den which he called an office, garnished with a few chairs, a goodly array of books around the walls, and a table covered with what I took to be some black cloth, but was now a mass of oil and ink. A glance at his face told me I had a shrewd subject to deal with.

Having introduced myself I stated briefly my object in calling. I had an idea that with this man I should not effect my object by bold questioning. To my question if he could inform me what became of Mr. Gordon's brother's wife, if I can find her."

"Where does it arise? I did not know she had any relation living."

"You perhaps know that Mrs. Gordon was married a second time, and that she died in Florence, having a child surviving her. Her husband is still living, but has lost his child. This history is, of course, not new to you. I wish to ascertain whether I can make it for your interests to aid in restoring the child. Mr. Ashmun is wealthy. If you are not already retained by Mr. Gordon it would be to prevent over-zeal using me, I think I can make it an object for you to be on our side."

"I think not."

"Why so?"

"I know no such person as you speak of. I have never even known that there was such a person as a younger Eve Ashmun."

"I do not think I mentioned any such person," said I, fixing my eyes on his face, which gave visible tokens of his chagrin at having overstepped his mark in naming the child.

"Ah—yes—I thought you said the child's name was the same as the mother's. I have some recollection of Mr. Ashmun when he was a young man. But I know nothing of him or of the Gordons of late years. After the elopement of Henry Gordon's wife she was never heard of again by either her husband or brother."

"Never?"

"Never."

"Do you happen to know the present residence of Joseph Gordon?"

"No; I never heard of him after his removal from this place."

"I beg your pardon, but from your certainty that his sister was never heard of I gathered that you must have seen him from time to time."

The coolness of my intimation that I did not believe him staggered the man. I hastened to add, "Mr. Whistone, we may as well understand each other. You know where Eve Ashmun is. If you will tell me I will pay you ten times your demand. If you will not, I must find her without your aid."

"Try it, sneered Whistone, "and we will see whose arm is strongest: yours to find, or ours to conceal."

"So be it. But before I leave you let me give you a hint. I did not come here with any hope to accuse your employer, but only to know one fact; whether Eve Ashmun was alive or dead. You have not been keen enough to conceal that, and I am perfectly content with the result of this interview."

And with this result I was forced to be content. I returned to New York and the investigations in Ashmun the success of my inquiries. It but aroused him to greater anxiety, and indeed to such inquiries as made me anxious about the result; but six months of vain search calmed him again, and I forgot him, except when I occasionally called for my share of his business, or when he rushed furiously into my office with some whim in his head that I had to talk out of it.

CHAPTER IV.

I HAVE already intimated that this story is not strictly a professional story, but is one with which I became acquainted in the practice of the profession. It was about a year after the murder that old citizen had been knocked down in the street and robbed of valuable papers, and was found dying. He lived only long enough to describe his assailant, and the next morning a man named Thompson was arrested by the police, fully answering the description of the murderer. Withal he had blood on his sleeves and a slung-shot in his pocket, and answered interrogatories in a confused way. The case was strong against him. The Grand Jury were in session, and he was indicted the day after he was arrested, and the trial appointed for the end on his stating that he was a stranger, without any friends, and that the court assigned counsel for him, and by his request I was the man. I had no spare no expense in obtaining his acquittal. Preston came to me and begged me to forego the case I had in hand, promising, as I had satisfied of his innocence, and on learning that the murdered man's pocket-book was not taken, and that his robber was seen to examine a few days through the post-office, I became convinced that Thompson could have had no concern in the crime. Subsequent to a full hearing of the case, readiness for trial, and his ability to establish an alibi so clearly that there could be no doubt of his acquittal, Thompson was discharged for his trial immediately, and within four weeks after his arrest he was on trial.

I had an interview with his chief witness the night preceding the trial. I had some difficulty in obtaining sight of him, but I did not accuse to me all forward that he could not intercourse. When I did see him it was in Thompson's cell, and seated on a bench, by the dim light from the grating. In this gloom he struck me as a fit companion in countenance for my client. He was a tall, finely-formed man, with no doubt considerable elegance, and was presented to me as Captain Jamison. He represented himself as an Englishman of the middle class, who had come to the city accidentally. Thompson was his servant and traveling valet, or factotum, a sort of American drayman. The evening preceding to his arrest, that is, the evening of the murder, he was on a boat on the North River coming from Albany, with Thompson in his employ as usual. He did not reach New York till some six hours after the murder was committed. Another servant was prepared to corroborate his testimony, and would be in court at the trial. This seemed to be satisfactory, and we parted to meet in the court-room the next morning.

At ten that evening Ashmun came to my house.

I had not seen him for some weeks, and was surprised at his unusual animation.

"What's the news?"

"I am at last at bay."

"Ah! and how so?"

"I have been shot at to-night—"

"And you think the next shot will speed you, and you give up the search in this world. Is that the idea?"

"Bah! no. Don't you understand? There is but one man in the world that would shoot me. He must be near. See! I kept the pistol ball. It is the only message I have had from Gordon in years. But I prize it. Do you know my life has been attempted once before?"

"I have heard nothing of it."

"I met, three nights ago, a man about my own size, who jostled against me on the pavement with a force that nearly drove me into the gutter. You have some experience of my way of behaving in such cases. It was very much that way our acquaintance began. I turned swiftly enough to catch the scoundrel's arm as he aimed a blow at my head with a short club. He howled as I twisted his arm in its socket. I then struck him in the face again in a hurry. Surprised, and in fact rendered useless by the twist I gave him, he took to his heels. I should have stopped the collision accidental, but when this pistol ball came into my library window last night I began to think Gordon was about, and I strongly suspected his design on my murder."

"For what possible motive can he do so?"

"Did you not tell Whistone that I had made a will in Eve's favor?"

"I did."

"He will murder me and marry Eve, who is wholly in his power. Or, worse than that, he would destroy us both, and secure my fortune to himself by a will which he would get Eve to execute. I can see through it all, in a dozen different points of view."

"I think it; it is too horrible."

"I tell you, Blackstone, I know my man. He is one of the vilest scoundrels that the world ever produced. Such men make me believe there is a hell."

"Well, you must go to-night. I have a murder case to-morrow, and I wish to be ready."

"A murder case? I will come and see you try it. Who knows how soon you may be defending some one for the murder of your friend Ashmun?"

"I will play the traitor and let him hang, if I dream there is the remotest possibility of his guilt of such a crime."

"Not so. Save him if you can, even though he be guilty himself, and let him live for me to haunt him. If I could but be a ghost; if I could but get rid of this weight of flesh; if I could but be free, invisible, every where, with the power to slaughter; if I could but— Blackstone, in pity hire some dog to kill me. I wish I were dead now. Let me sit by the window to-night to be shot at. I will light the room, open the shutters, and—will that be suicide? I am sick, tired, weary of life. I know that all this was going. Good-night! If I could but find her!"

I saw that he was in one of his strange moods, and I deemed it best to humor them. So I made him sit down, and I strove to calm him.

"I know not why it is," said he, "that I have been so impressed with the idea that my child is near me, and that I am soon to see her. Oh, my God! could I only receive the glory of that vision which haunts my memory! Could you but sleep my sleep and dream my dreams! Could you but see my child as I see her! Beautiful beauty—but look into the unfathomable blessing of her eyes—but hear the music of her words of perfect affection! I know that all this was once yours, but may never be yours again—never; never!—you would know the terrible meaning of that word, never." The world is full of mocking beauty. The sky weighs me down as if it were a load on my shoulders. The wind thrusts in my face as if in ambition burns into my soul. For sky, air, and sunshine were once the joys of our young lives, and they are now the witnesses of the hopes that curse me.

But it is nearly over. This presentiment, if you so choose to call it, is so strong that I am not doubtful, but that I shall find Eve soon. Do you think—do you think it may be in another world? I had not thought of that before. You know it. Your idea may be right."

"My idea?"

"It was your suggestion when I came in."

I talked with him for an hour, and sent him home with a servant. He laughed at the caution, but I insisted, and he yielded.

The next day I was engaged in the trial of Thompson.

The case for the prosecution was made out without much difficulty. The cross-examined witnesses but little, trusting entirely to our proof of absence from the city, which was ample.

I had examined the Englishmen, who was the other servant of Captain Jamison, and whose testimony was clear and satisfactory. At the moment that I called Jamison to the stand, and while the clerk was administering the oath, I felt a hand on my shoulder, and looking up saw Ashmun holding a chair behind me. He nodded, and I acknowledged his presence by a smile, when I was startled at the change in his countenance. He was leaning his shoulder toward the witnesses' seat, and his gaze became intense for an instant; then a smile of apparent exultation passed over his face, and he leaned over to me and whispered:

"You have him at last."

"Whom?"

"Gordon."

"Where?"

"That man on the stand."

"Gordon! Impossible! It is Captain Jamison."

"Ah! his mother's name. Blackstone, I can't be mistaken; that man is Joseph Gordon."

Like a thunder-stroke came over me the idea that this might be true. It explained the whole mystery of the murder. The victim was mistaken for Ashmun. It was in his street, near his house, that the murder was committed. This alibi was trumped up to clear him. It was well managed, too. No wonder he had hesitated to meet me before. No wonder I had never seen him in the court-room. That scar on his cheek was a mark in his youth. I remembered it myself twenty years ago. All this flashed through me in the instant while I turned from Ashmun to the witness, and as the judge said "Proceed, gentlemen," I can not define the impulse which induced me to abandon the case before me and demand of the witness in a tone which startled him and the whole court-room,

"Your name is Joseph Gordon?"

"Henry Jamison," said the clerk of the court, but not soon enough to check the fury that gleamed from the eyes of the witness. I recovered my composure, whispered to Ashmun to leave the court-room and wait for me at my office, and then proceeded with the examination. I never recollected precisely how the trial ended. I was never so much embarrassed, for while I was defending the prisoner the conviction was growing on my mind that he was guilty. The judge spared me the trouble of attending to the case. Before the witness had answered ten questions the court informed me that he considered the case that he would do well to abandon any idea of conviction, and the verdict of not guilty was recorded without the necessity of the jury retiring.

While I was gathering my papers together the prisoner and Captain Jamison disappeared. An officer handed me a sealed envelope. It contained a large counsel fee, but I never saw my client again.

I hastened to my office to meet Ashmun, but he was not there. I remained till the evening, but did not see him, and called at his house on my way home. He was not. I was the next day I heard from his servant, who called at my office, that he had left word for me that he should be out of town several days, and I went out to myself any concern about his business. I understood the vague message, and waited patiently for news of his success. I next heard from him in a singular place. The following is a copy of his brief note:

—— COUNTY JAIL, December 8, 18—.

"Come up here and see me. YOURS, "ASHMUN."

I obeyed the summons with as much speed as might be.

LITTLE WHITE-THORN.

A Breton Legend.

In those beautiful old times when wrong never prevailed long over right, when the good prospered, and the wicked were overthrown—that is to say, in the times before the world was turned upside down, there lived in Finistere a pious widow, who had an only daughter, named Christeen, with hair like spun silk, and blue eyes, and a face so delicate and white in its transparency that it looked like pretty pearl. Little White-thorn. The widow's father was a large farmer owning land of his own, and feeding on the moors hundreds of sheep, and possessing in the water-meadows numerous cattle. A sparkling brook that slid down the purple moor-sides was considered by him to a be had little less a depression on the fell slope, among some green ash-trees and flowering elder, should there be cream ready for churning over the big water-wheel, looking, from a distance, in the sun, like a large wavering wheel of crystal and silver. There also built a bake-house, where his wheat-flour was made into delicious white cakes, and his barley-loaves were baked brown, and where, also, his great buckwheat pancakes were prepared for the laborers who tilled his soil.

Alas! even in those good old times, before the world was turned upside down, people died. The farmer fell ill, deceased, and his property was divided among his children. He had three sons; but his only daughter was the widow, the mother of White-thorn. The eldest took the house, the land, and the milch kine; the second took the malt and the horses; and the third took the bakehouse and the sheep. Nothing remained to the widow but her cottage except an occasional visit to the moors, far away from the village, where, occasionally, in bad weather, the shepherd had been wont to take shelter. When the old man's sons bewailed the injustice of her brothers, the eldest said to her:

"Now, Elizabeth, I will prove to you how full of affection I am. A dear, good sister you have always been to me, and when I was ill in fever, you nursed me with the utmost care; therefore, I will now make you a handsome present. I have an old black cow, which yields scarcely a cupful of milk; you are welcome to it. Let White-thorn put a halter round its neck, and lead it to your hovel."

So Elizabeth took a stick and beat the cow behind, and White-thorn pulled the halter in front; and thus, after much trouble, the old black cow was brought to the hut on the moors, which was all that belonged to the widow. Every day little White-thorn took the cow out of its stable and pastured it on the moors; there was no food for it there except young gorse tops, and fern shoots, and the thin gray grass that sprouted about the mossy spots. When the cow snuffed after herbage, the girl picked flowers—little deep blue gentians, marsh marigolds, the delicate waxen tufts of cotton-grass, the sparkling sun-dew, and the turquoise-blue forget-me-not; and these she made into nosegays, which she brought to her mother at sunset, to adorn the cottage table.

One day, as White-thorn was making a chaplet of flowers, she noticed a beautiful bird perched on a white bush, singing sweetly. The little creature turned its bright head, and eyes and bill and twittered to her, exactly as if it were speaking. "What do you wish to say?" asked White-thorn, leaning toward it. The bird fluttered its wings, hopped nearer to her, turned its head on one side, and began to prattle once more. "I can not understand you," said the girl, with a sigh. Then the bird jumped on her shoulder, and chirped louder. "It is all in vain," said White-thorn. "You must speak French if you would make me comprehend." But, as the little bird could not do this, it spread its wings, smote the air with them, once, twice, thrice, and was gone.

The sun had now set: White-thorn looked round. In the still, green sky hung the silver speck of the evening-star, like a gem dropped on a sunlit lawn. And there, flying in the soft air, was the bird, like a tiny dark spot, becoming smaller and smaller, till it had quite disappeared. And all that while the star became brighter and brighter, till it burned like a lamp of fire. Now White-thorn called the black cow. She could not see the dear animal any where. She ran hither and thither, but perceived no traces of it; and the darkness fell, and she would have lost her way had not she heard her mother's voice calling loudly, "White-thorn, White-thorn!" Then she cried, "Mother, but where is the cow?" "The cow is here, my child. White-thorn hastened to her mother, and found the old woman standing by the mangled remains of the black cow. The wolves had fallen on it and devoured it, leaving only the bones, the horns, and the black tail, with the black tuft of hair at its extremity. White-thorn uttered a cry of sorrow, and flung herself on the grass beside the bones of the cow. "Do not lament over the bones as over a Christian," said the widow. "Come within, White-thorn, we will have our supper, and then go to bed."

The little girl was hardly able to sleep all night; her heart ached for the cow, and as soon as the sun rose she arose from her bed, and crept forth in her white night-dress, with bare feet and arms, upon the moor. The morning light glistened on the gossamer that was flung over the gorse bushes, and the long spider-threads, strung with dew, were like rosaries of diamonds which the wind was wielding as it passed by each. And there, perched on a bush of yellow broom, was the sweet bird who had sung to White-thorn in the day before. The girl crept toward it, and, kneeling beside the broom, listened attentively to its twittering. The little creature seemed to speak sweetly to her, but not a word could she understand. Then, needlessly, she put her naked arm for a cushion that lay like a cry of gold in the grass, and she bade it kneel. To all good children, that whoever touches that flower with bare feet, and with conscience undefiled, comes for knowledge of the language of birds, beasts, and fishes. The soul of White-thorn was transparent, and unstained as a mountain lake; so, no sooner had she touched the little golden blossom, than, all at once, what the bird said became intelligible to her.

White-thorn, dear White-thorn," were its words, "I love you well, so listen to what I say."

"Who are you?" asked the child, astonished at her newly-acquired power.

"I am Robin Redbreast," answered the bird. "And I am the lover of every year making one good, poor child happy. This time I shall do this for you."

"Oh you darling Robin!" exclaimed White-thorn. "Then I shall have a little silver cross on my breast, and a new pair of wooden shoes, so that I need not run about barefoot any longer."

"You shall have a golden cross and satin shoes, like a great lady," said Robin Redbreast.

"How so, my dearest birdie?"

"Follow me and you shall see."

And White-thorn jumped up. Robin smote the air with his wings, once, twice, thrice, and was away, flying over the glistening expanse of moor, toward the sea. And every now and then it perched on a gorse tuft or a shrub of white heath, and chirped loudly. Robin said, "The child followed gladly, and the bird led her down the moor-side among gray lichened granite rocks, then over a bank-shelved field, where a tiny whitish pink pin-points of flowers were spying the dew that dripped from their leaves, then out on the yellow sand strewn with shining purses and kelp. In the bay were seven little holms, usually surrounded by laughing blue water, but now the sea was out, and as high of coast as land to them. Robin Redbreast stayed his flight, and said:

"Do you see any thing on the beach?"

"Yes! I see a pair of wooden shoes brightly polished, shoes that have not yet been browned at the fire, and a belt of holly that has not yet been lopped of its leaves and berries."

"Put on the shoes and take the staff."

"I have done so."

"Now, walk along the sands to the first of the seven isles, go round it till you reach a cliff before which some rushes grow."

"And what then?"

"Pluck the rushes and twist them into a rope."

"What next?"

"Then strike the rock thrice with your staff, and a cow will issue from it, lay the rush-rope round its neck, and lead it home to your mother."

White-thorn followed these directions implicitly. She walked lightly in her wooden shoes over the treacherous sand, she wove her rope of rushes, struck the rock, and from it came forth a cow, with a skin as soft as hair, and as white, with eyes gentle as those of a spaniel, and with a beautiful white full udder. White-thorn threw the halter round its neck, and led the beast home to her mother, who was overjoyed to see it. But how was her wonder increased when she heard to milk into the cow, as White-thorn called her. The milk spirted between her fingers and flowed without cessation, like water from out of a rock in springs. Then she filled all the pails, then all the pots, jugs, kettles, and mugs, with milk, and still the stream flowed. "Run, run, White-thorn, to your uncle Joseph, and borrow a couple of pails," cried the widow. And the child skipped over the heather to the farm, and told the farmer the wonder.

The news soon spread, and half the village came to see. Every one brought a pail or a pitcher. They found Elizabeth seated by the cow, in a great pool of milk, which poured from the sea-beast, flowed in a white rill over the threshold, and was lost in the moor sand outside. Never was more delicious milk tasted, never was richer cream seen. Joseph gazed in astonishment; he tasted the milk, smacked his lips, tasted again, shook his head, and then said:

"Dear sister, you know how I have always loved you. You have, I am certain, a true sisterly affection for me, and you will not refuse me the cow when I ask you for it, and offer instead all my cows."

Elizabeth replied: "Sea-cow is priceless. How could I give her to you for your cattle? She is worth more than all the cows in the village."

"Well, then, dearest sister, I will give you my farm and farm-house, the stables, the carts, and harness."

Then Elizabeth yielded. She took the key of the house, she cut a turf in the fields, drank out of the well, lit a fire on the hearth, and cut a handful of hair out of the horses' tails, as evidence that all these now belonged to her. Then she gave the sea-cow to her brother, and he went away with the beast to a large town, where the demand for milk would be so enormous that he was the supply. But poor White-thorn cried, for she loved her Sea-cow dearly; and all day long her cheeks were wet with tears. As evening she went into the stable to see if all the cattle were supplied with hay, and then she sobbed aloud. "Oh, my dear Sea-cow!" repeated she, in the wailed. Immediately she heard a lowing behind her, and, on looking round, saw her Sea-cow returning. Her udder was distended, and the light were over she asked, stroking the creature's soft hide:

"Who has brought you back to me, pretty pet?"

"I have returned of my own accord. I could not live with your uncle, who is a wicked and avaricious man."

"Alas! my mother will have to give up the house and farm, now that you have come back."

"Not so," replied the cow. "For your grandfather had left all to your mother, but the brothers deceived the wife, and robbed your mother of what is rightfully hers."

"But you will be recognized, my pretty darling."

"Not if you will do what I bid you. Pluck three clover leaves and bring them to me."

White-thorn went out, and when the cow munched the green leaves, she called, as bidden, Robin Redbreast, three times. Now, the third time she called all at once the bird came flying into a beautiful horse, to White-thorn's great delight.

"You will certainly not be recognized now," said she; "and I shall henceforth call you Sea-horse."

The widow was rejoiced when she heard what had taken place. Next day she brought the horse out to lade it with corn for the market. Imagine her astonishment when she found the back of the horse lengthen to accommodate as many sacks as she deemed fit to send to market; so Sea-horse went home one day heavily laden, and all the other horses in the village. This was soon known to the second brother, Phillips, who came, examined the horse, bid for it like the other horses, and all the pigs he fed. The widow accepted the offer; the mill became hers, and the Sea-horse was transferred to Phillips. Phillips, who left the place with the horse to go to a town where the amount to be carried would be equal to the capacity of the horse's back, found, like White-thorn was sad at heart, and at night, when she went to the stable, she sobbed, and said: "Oh, my dear Sea-horse! are you not here?" Then she heard a neigh behind her, and, looking round, she saw that Sea-horse had returned.

"I could not remain with your wicked uncle," said the animal; "so I have returned to you. Now fetch me three clover leaves, and while I am eating them call three times on Robin Redbreast."

White-thorn obeyed implicitly, and the bird in three was suddenly transformed into a beautiful sheep, with long fleece as white as wool and as fine as silk.

"Go to dear creature," exclaimed White-thorn. "I shall call you Sea-sheep."

The widow came in next morning to see the weather, and as she gazed on the sheep she said: "Run, daughter, and fetch me the shears, for the poor creature is encumbered with its thick coat that is scarcely move."

Well, the Sea-sheep was shorn, and, as fast as the wool was cut off, fresh grew on the skin, and so abundant was the fleece that Elizabeth said that Sea-sheep was worth all the sheep on the moors around. The child brought the fleece to the widow, and as he hastened to the farm, where he examined the wool with surprise.

"I must have this sheep," said he. "Sister, I will give you the bake-house, and my sheep and oxen, in exchange for this creature."

The widow objected to the bargain, and the man drove Sea-sheep away. But his road lay along the cliffs, over the frothing, tossing blue sea, and as he came out of the lanes above the water, the sheep suddenly leaped off the headland into the sea and swam to the Seven Isles, and vanished at the rock where grew the dark green rushes, which opened to receive it and closed behind it. In the evening, White-thorn waited in vain in the meadow for the Sea-sheep's return; but the night passed, and it returned no more. Then she went, sad at heart, over the heather. On a holly-bush sat perched Robin Redbreast, and the bird said to her:

"Dear White-thorn, you must not expect to see Sea-sheep again, she has gone forever. Your uncles are punished for their avarice and injustice. You have now enough to live upon, to be content. Fly, my darling, a golden cross to hang on your bosom, and satin shoes, and—forget not the poor."

With these words, Robin fluttered his wings. He beat the air once, twice, thrice, and darted up high into the clear blue sky, and White-thorn saw him no more.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE latest reports from various sections of the country give indications of a very satisfactory harvest. In most of the States the crops of Indian corn crops are unusually large; hay is plentiful, hops abundant, and potatoes doing quite well. The cotton crop promises a good deal in different sections: in Louisiana the yield will be large, notwithstanding the rains have caused some damage and the cotton worm appeared; in the West Florida cotton will be a failure, and reports from Alabama are not encouraging. In Georgia and Mississippi, however, the prospects are encouraging. In South Carolina the cotton looks well, the crop will be excellent, fruits are abundant, and the farmers are jubilant. In Kentucky, Tennessee, Texas, and some other States, fruit has been plentiful and of fine quality. In this portion of the country peaches and apples will be light, according to present indications.

In England and Scotland the harvests were unusually early, and the season very propitious for ripening, but the drought has been very severe, and plenty of wheat and hay will not compensate farmers for the total or partial loss of many other valuable crops. Still, if it rains full quarter-grass will grow rapidly, and some late crops be secured, which will mitigate the evil of a short supply of stock food. A correspondent of the London Times contrasts the years 1867 and 1868, as follows:

"Last year was a summer; this year, during the summer months, the heat has been almost unparalleled. Of the crops of last year wheat was the only deficient crop: this year wheat is the only abundant crop. Last year the failure of a Turkey crop was the exception; this year it is the rule. Last year the thunderstorms which were attending grass fields enhanced the prediction of lower prices of beef and mutton, while wet weather in the West of England was usually short supply of such foods, and from the enormous crops of Hungary sheep or cattle, the price of beef or mutton will probably range higher in the autumn than during last year."

A great deal has been said from time to time about the adulteration of the milk sold in our city. There is no doubt that much of the milk sold by stealers, and that milk is sometimes spoiled by being brought to market before the animal heat has been properly eliminated; there is also some need for caution against what is known as "rectified" milk. Yet investigation shows that on the whole, New York is well supplied with rich, pure milk. It would be useless for the Board of Health to act as an active inquisitor consumed by our citizens: but large and responsible milkmen generally conduct their business in an honest and honorable manner. It is a good test of the quality of milk to observe how long it will rise on the when allowed to stand. Some firms sell great quantities of cream; and as cheese is said to be made from the skimmed milk, we are not to suppose that any cream is surreptitiously removed from what we buy as "pure milk." It is estimated that 20,000,000 gallons of milk are consumed by New York city every year.

In hot and sultry weather ice, which we have come to regard as necessary, is generally a luxury of life, is often difficult to be procured, even in refrigerators. This is undoubtedly owing to a change in our ways of care, or want of knowledge. Not only should the ice be surrounded by the most perfect non-conductors of heat, but the water produced by melting must be instantly carried off from the ice. An English writer on the subject says: "Ice has two tastes; it possesses, warm air and water, but the latter is by far the more detestable. Ice will not melt when both touches the rapidly of air at 80°." A moderate-sized block of ice can be made to last a long time by wrapping it carefully in dry flannel, and placing it on a grating so that no water can accumulate underneath. When the flannel becomes damp it should be replaced by other dry piece. If housekeepers would give a little personal attention to the matter, instead of intrusting the care to servants who do not understand the science of refrigeration, there would be little difficulty in having ice for breakfast, even if the "ice-man" does not come "in season."

In the northern region of the south of France, at Mont d'Or, in Auvergne, are baths which are curious in the extreme degree, and which have been much frequented. On entering "Les Bains" a cavern is seen hollowed in the solid rock, in the corner of which is a wooden covered apartment. The cover being removed from this a spirt of steam arises from the hot spring below. The sides of the cavern are damp, and bunches placed around it. The patient on beginning a course of baths undresses and takes his place in the closed box, remains gradually every quarter of an hour until the hot steam becomes insupportable, he then is wrapped in a blanket and conducted by a room where a coffin-like bath of rough stone, filled with a muck-colored fluid, awaits him. Although, from its appearance, this bath is most pleasant, the skin becoming softened, white, and cuticle is the water itself has a liquid velvet, so soft and creamy to the touch. No one is permitted to take a vapor or bath in Auvergne without a doctor's order to do so. The eminent medical men who frequent the Comme is talented to with attention by large audiences.

At West Rutland, Vermont, there are ten different marble quarries in active operation, while on the western edge of the valley three others are in process of development. The purity, thickness of the veins in these quarries is nearly fifty feet, and it is so straight and regular that it can be worked in any direction, and as to be easily worked to a thickness. There is a great variety, both in color and quality of marble, from the purest white to the various colored and, the best often, lying in close proximity to the purest. One layer of marble is between two of limestone, and all so strangely intermingled that from the purest white to the most beautifully variegated marble are found.

A curious suit has been brought for divorce in St. Louis. It is the petition of the husband to the court, declares that her husband is a monomaniac on the subject of cats, and that he frequently gets up in the night and hurl at them with a pistol under his head, and says he will "unload the place by morning." He was killed on the premises to be legally relieved from loaded pistols.

A singular accident occurred at the execution of the murderers of Prince Michael in Servia. A musket-bullet rebounded from the post to which one of the criminals was attached and struck the forehead of the officer who was in command of the executing party. He was killed on the spot.

The following story is said to be one which Mr. Dickens picked up in his late visit to this country. A man had a dream one every body. Name what celebrity you could, Palmerston, Guizot, Anjou, Lansseer, Livingstone, Mario—no matter. "Oh yes, I knew him very well indeed." At last a provoked cynic asked, "Did you happen to know the Siamese Twins?" The omniscient but contemptible spectator at once replied, "Well, one of them I knew exceedingly well, but I am not quite sure whether I ever happened to meet the other."

A thrilling accident occurred at Niagara Falls a short time ago. A little girl while playing near the railing of the bridge leaning from the main load to Goat Island lost her balance and fell into the rapids. Instantly a young man named Moulton plunged in to rescue the child. Grasping the little one and keeping her head above water both were swept on toward the rapids, and destruction seemed inevitable. But Moulton, being an expert swimmer, struck manfully with the rushing torrent and succeeded in reaching the shore with the child, before fate, the brink of the cataract. The young man risked his life more nobly than those who venture into danger merely for notoriety.

The Wesleyan Methodists held their annual Camp Meeting at Antoine's Vineyard last week. The first assembled there in 1835, and with the exception of a short interval, have met there every year since. In 1857 the daily attendance was about 10,000; this year it was estimated to be larger. The camp grounds are owned by an association of prominent Methodists; there are one hundred and fifty acres in all, though less quite seventy-five are occupied at present. There are about two hundred wooden cottages on the grounds, which are let by the week with the consent of officers of the association; and during the meetings tents are of course thickly sprinkled among the cabanes. Stringent regulations for maintaining order are enforced; no liquor or beer appears any where, and card-playing and liquor-selling are forbidden at all times.

Tomatoes, whether eaten raw or cooked, are most healthful and highly nutritious. The tomato season is now with us for a brief, but if the weather be favorable frost comes, and hung in a well-ventilated cellar with the tomatoes upon them, it is said they will continue to ripen for some weeks.

The Swiss have begun to make practical use of the glaciers. Not only do ice-houses appear as permanences art cut from the ice, packed in boxes, and sent off in fast trains to the large cities of France, where they arrive with little waste.

A pretty good story is told of a Western man, who, stopping in Boston for a day, went to a hotel after dinner, and sauntered out for a walk. Soon a policeman tapped him on the shoulder and informed him that he had thrown away two dollars for smoking in the street. The stranger broke a V, and paid the penalty. Being rather a timid creature, he "pumped" to buy a box of bread, and hadn't had any breakfast or dinner, when his Western generosity made he bestowed a remnant of gingerbread upon the hungry one. Thereupon a new and different appearance was given him that he had violated another ordinance of the city, with a $2 fine. The hoosier handed out the $2 bill. The officer examined him for a moment, and shook his head: "Keep the whole—I shall want to whistle constantly."

The recent fires in the Canadian forests have caused losses which are estimated at several millions of dollars. A large advertising district in Toronto, Canada, containing fifteen or sixteen buildings, has been consumed, and other extensive sections have been overrun by the devouring element.

In San Francisco fruit-shops are scattered, or rather congregated, in the most fashionable portion of the city. It has been said that Californians eat fruit as if they lived on nothing else, and it is true that every thing else as if they had never touched fruit. A recent visitor to the Golden Gate remarked that the San Francisco fruit-market at the present time, remarks: "Fruits is out;' we having only oranges, bananas, pine-apples, guavas, and other tropicals. In a few weeks we shall have some variety, and in September and October, when we can away into November, the varieties are so great, and the specimens so excellent, that even the California fruit-eating constitutional fear of fruit consumption is absolutely in despair what to select, and very often how to get through with what he has selected.

There recently died at Weed, in Germany, a man by the name of Jacobs, who was 104 years old, while living, of a beard eleven feet long. It is now in possession of the Museum, he having attached in his will that it should be taken off and preserved.

In the vicinity of Wexham, Wales, the magnificent spectacle of a mountain on fire has been recently witnessed. Cronday, near which is spur of the Eglwyg Mountain, is the scene of conflagration. Every effort has been made to prevent the spread of the fire, no extremely difficult task on account of the dryness of the turf and the almost total absence of water in the neighborhood. At the last accounts it had extended over a surface embraced in a circumference of about nine miles.

Innumerable remedies have been proposed to cure hydrophobia—from tobacco smoke to a lapis vitriol. In the Siglo Medical, a Spanish medical journal, suggests a preventative to the dreadful disorder. Whether the preventive would not be almost as bad as the disease, may be a question—at least, it is an exceedingly unpleasant one, as will be perceived from the fact that a long time past the peasants of Galicia have entertained the idea that dogs suffering from rabies, and every common in that province, are not liable to contract hydrophobia after they have had the bite of the reptile. This belief has induced them to endeavor to protect their dogs from the bites of vipers, by inoculating them bitten by vipers while young. A Spanish physician has instituted experiments with a view to test the value of this preventive, and, having a number of young dogs to be stung by vipers, and, after recovery, to be inoculated by the bite of mad dogs. The result was, that in every case they were found to be insensible to the bite of the viper, whether it was later often, or at what period of their life they were subjected to the ordeal. If dogs are prevented from contracting hydrophobia by the inoculation of the reptile bite, it can be considered necessary that cows should be inoculated with viper virus!

They have some curious specimens in Boston. Among the curiosities is a strange license, and on being asked the name of the lady, said he didn't know; that he was going to marry a lady in a few days, but he had yet concluded which he would have. He proposed to buy a license with the name blank, and when he came to a conclusion would fill up the blank with the other name. But somehow or somewhat disappointed when informed that such a style of doing business was not customary in Boston.

The largest dog in the world, according to report, was one raised in Pennsylvania from the Siberian wolf-dog. This dog, when but a year old, blood-hound stock. had attained the length of seven feet nine inches, was thirty-six and a half inches high, and weighed two hundred pounds. A challenge to fight a lion's cub given was offered in 1868, when his owner exhibited him in Philadelphia. The animal was of a larger specimen, but the article was not forthcoming.

PROSPECT PARK, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.—DRAWN BY H. FERN.—[SEE PAGE 586.]

THE FIRST BIRD OF THE SEASON.

PROSPECT PARK, BROOKLYN.

THE Commissioners of this Park begun their work in 1861. The grounds were surveyed, but that year proved unfavorable to carrying forward the necessary improvements. The breaking out of the war had paralyzed commerce and checked industry. Almost all that was done beyond surveys was the thorough organization of the Board of Commissioners, and the appointment of a watchman to protect the trees and shrubbery from depredation.

The lands embraced in the Park as first laid out extended over a space of nearly 500 acres, costing $1,357,606. Three-fourths of this sum had been paid in 1864. "The grand features of the plan," says the Sixth Annual Report of the Commissioners (for 1865), "are simple and easily comprehended; but the Commissioners wish to direct attention particularly to those regions of distinct character embodied in it, in each of which, it will be observed, the suggestions of the natural conditions of the land are proposed to be developed. They are, first, a region of open meadow, with large trees standing singly and in groups; second, a hilly district, with groves and shrubbery; and third, a lake district, containing a fine sheet of water, with picturesque shores and islands. These being the landscape characteristics, the first gives room for extensive playgrounds; the second offers shaded rambles and broad views; and the third presents good opportunities for skating and rowing."

This plan involved a considerable enlargement of the original boundaries of the Park. "The Commissioners," continues the Report, "have now no doubt that the Park will soon become a favorite resort for all classes of our community, enabling thousands to enjoy pure air, with healthful exercise, at all seasons of the year; while it magnificently has and ocean views, with the beautiful drives through its broad meadows and shady groves, free from the dust and confusion inseparable from crowded thoroughfares, will without strong inducements to the affluent to remain in our city, who are now often induced to change their residences by the seductive influences of the New York Park."

Messrs. Olmsted, Vaux, & Co. were employed to set forth a general plan for the laying out and improvement of the grounds. The success of these landscape architects in Central Park was certainly a sufficient assurance of their competency for this work. These artists recommended an extension of the Park to the south-east, so as to include a broad plain, "overlooked on the Park side by the highest ground in the vicinity from the top of which there is a prospect to the southward, which includes a large sweep of the ocean, the Highlands of Navesink, Sandy Hook, and a large part of the harbor of New York. The extension involved an addition of 250 acres. The broad plain, already alluded to, has been chosen as the site for the formation of the Parade. Forty acres of ground adjoining the Park have been selected as the parade-ground for the military of Kings County.

Several interesting relics have recently been developed upon the Revolutionary battle-field which constitutes a portion of the Park. The gilded balls and bones are frequently turned up by the workmen, marking the spot where once the tide of battle surged. The little knoll to the east, commanding the Flatbush and Old Post roads at their junction in the Valley Grove, was the site of a British ordnance battery, which enfiladed the former road, up which the Hessians marched to assault Sullivan's lines on the memorable morning of the 27th of August, 1776, from which they more than once recoiled in dismay. A few rods to the north of this battery, and almost in the centre of the Flatbush road, stands the Dongan Oak—a famous landmark—which was felled on the morning to obstruct the passage of the enemy between the hills. This location will be easily recognized as the road-way immediately in front of the Valley Grove Tavern, leading southerly into Flatbush. The battle-park, with the site of the redoubt, will be carefully preserved and distinctly marked for the veneration of future generations.

The improvements are rapidly progressing, and the Park has already been opened to the public.

ELECTRICAL NOVELTIES.

MAN has lately entrapped electricity into a great many useful positions. Of its public services we need hardly speak: telegraphy has become too familiar to be longer regarded as curiosities. There is more difficulty in the way of getting a good and cheap source of electricity which have barred the way to their extensive introduction; but some of these are removed, and we may entertain better hopes for the future. A celebrated London photographer has erected a magneto-electric machine for conducting some of his operations which require an intensely bright illumination, and has thus apparently become independent of sunshine: in reality, he is using the solar rays which came to our planet thousands of years ago, for what is coal but "hottest sunshine?" A Birmingham electro-plating firm also set up a similar machine for depositing their precious metals, and a sugar refinery another for generating ozone to bleach sugar. An ingenious inventor has proposed to illuminate boys and beacons by electricity, and a French firm has offered to light the English channel by the same means.

Quite recently M. Blondeau brought before the French Academy of Sciences the results of some experiments for ripening fruits by electricity. He electrified apples, pears, and peaches, all which ripened under the influence of the fluid, while other fruit on the same trees remained far from ripe. He electrified seeds and grains by steeping them in water and submitting them to the action of a powerful current. Peas, beans, and wheat were so treated and sown in good soil. By the side of them were sown similar seeds not electrified. The former sprouted sooner than the latter, developed more rapidly, and were more vigorous. Most mysterious of all, some electrified beans grew upside down, the roots in the air and the stem in the soil.

The most curious application of the electric light was that attempted lately at one of the Paris theatres. The actors were decked with glittering crowns, and, to add to their brilliancy, they were so made that a chaplet of electric sparks encircled the wearer's head, the necessary current being supplied and hid by a concealed battery. But the "sensation," pleasing enough doubtless to spectators, painfully verified the truth of the Shakespearian maxim touching the uneasiness of the head that wears a crown, for one of the "stars" was severely injured by the passage of the current through his or her head instead of through the star-spangled ornament. Not quite so dangerous, but still curious, are the electrical jewels made by MM. Trouvé and Gaiffe-Picard. These consist chiefly of scarf-pins and brooches, representing flowers of rose and animals which roll their eyes and work their jaws. None are in the shape of tiny soldiers which beat drums, inhabits their hats or bonnets, and hide that they their wings and fan their tails. They are worked by tiny electro-magnets concealed within them, and connected with small but powerful batteries carried in the pocket or elsewhere about the dress.

PARTED ONCE.

So we two clasp hands once more, Jamie,
Though our youth long since has passed;
And none are by to sever us now—
Do you mind me of the days long past?
Do you mind the tears we shed, Jamie,
The tender embrace that clung?
We can look back now with a pity strange
On the grief when we were young.

But the burnie that trickled then, Jamie,
Has grown to a river deep,
And none can ford it from side to side, dark gulf
Where the hopes of childhood sleep.
The pale ghosts stand on the shore, Jamie,
And wail with a voice of woe,
But the world and its waves of greed and care
Too long have rolled between.

They said we were idle bairns, Jamie—
Too young to meet toil and pain:
So you think back the days of Heaven, we two
Shall be children once again?
And should we have been worse off, Jamie,
Had we risked them and toiled?
And learned high lessons of love and faith,
And helped each other to bear?

There is gold on this withered breast, Jamie,
And wealth in this thin, gray head,
But, oh! for the gowans you plucked me then,
In my tanglet locks to wed!
We have lands in the far-off East, Jamie,
And ships on the treacherous sea,
Ah! who can restore the treasures of youth,
And love to you—or to me?

A GOOD PAYMASTER.

THE place was a farm-house, low roofed, elm shaded, vine bedecked, and neatly painted. The time was nine o'clock on a June morning, according to the old-fashioned and old-fashioned eight-day clock that stood in one corner of the low-ceiled kitchen where good Dame Allen turned masses of golden butter over and over in the whitest of wooden trays.

"Five minutes after nine," Essie Hicks said, referring to a tiny Geneva watch.

"You are fast," commented a young man, resting for a moment on the well curb, and turning a pair of honest brown eyes on the young lady who hung over the lower half of the old-fashioned door.

The girl glanced up quickly. "Fast?" she echoed, with a twinkle of soft, blue eyes. "Oh no! I never talk slang. I never bet, I drink no wine; I never ride a horse I am afraid of, and trembling; there isn't a particle of Di Vernon about me."

"I referred to your watch, Miss Hicks," said the young man, gravely.

"To be sure!" exclaimed the young lady, as if the idea had just presented to her. "I perhaps you are slow." She ran her eye over the young man with a glance that took in the gravity of his sun-burnt face and the lack of style in his garments.

The young man's face flushed in a crimson glow, but he replied quietly as if he did not comprehend the personality of her allusion.

"I have taken great pains in regulating the clock. It is a good timer."

"I suppose it regulates the rising and setting of the sun," said the young lady with a little sarcasm in her tone.

"Only my mother's son," answered the young man, unheeding the sarcasm. He picked up a slow-shave and moved away, settling the scythe-ble to a bevy, dull-eyed workman who followed him to the fields.

Essie Hicks looked after the young farmer.

"Terribly self-opinionated!" she said to herself, but she took the key from her chatelaine and turned back her watch five minutes.

Observe the girl returning to her old leaning attitude over the low door. It is not a face and form often seen in farm-houses. It would be more in place at Saratoga, or Newport, or Nahant. Fifty summers of luxurious city-parlor rooms in winter and sea-fogs in summer, of lily white and a trifle of rouge perhaps. That hair learned its habit of frizzing from a hair-dresser. That arch of the neck and that coquettish turn of the head were never learned out of society, and the white Marseilles dress, fitting so expressively the small graceful form, is the work of no country modiste. Mark the whiteness of the small hands toying with her chatelaine! Note the delicacy of the slippered foot that pats impatiently the hard, bare floor! Observe, most of all, the sweetness of the face that is turned toward Dame Allen now, and watches so intently the moulding of the rolls of golden butter!

"Is it for sale?" she asked, as Dame Allen patted the last roll almost tenderly and dented it deeply with her ladle.

"I keep it to sell," answered Dame Allen, with a pleased smile.

"How much is butter a pound?" inquired the young girl, sweetly.

Dame Allen almost laughed. It was a question worthy of a woman who had been brought up to careful economical habits.

"Eighteen pence or thereabouts," she answered, with pleased loquacity. "Mr. Cummings always gives me the best price in the market. He says to me sometimes 'there's no butter comes to town that can hold a candle to yours, Mrs. Allen.' You see, dear, I don't leave my milk too long, and I do my own salting, and I work it myself, and it stands to reason it should be better than my neighbors if they leave it to their hired help."

"How many pounds have you there?" asked the young lady, meditatively.

"Twenty pounds, more or less," answered Dame Allen, proudly.

Essie Hicks looked out of the window, thoughtfully. She was indulging in an example of Multiplication.

"Eighteen by twenty!" she said to herself. "So little! I spend the sum without a thought that seems to me a fortune. How long have you lived here?" she asked, a few minutes after.

"More's forty years," answered Dame Allen. "My husband that is dead and gone brought me here the day we was married, and I've never been away two days together since. I think the worst thing that could befall me would be to have to leave this place."

"Forty years!" Essie Hicks exclaimed, in a tone of incredulous astonishment, leaning her pretty head on her small hand, and looking over the broad meadow-lands that were the sum total for their grase was inward and profoundly meditative. "Forty years!" she repeated. "And I have not lived half that time! Dame Allen, the young girl standing there, with shadows creeping into the inward-gaping eyes, with wrinkles gathering on the smooth, pale cheeks, with lines of pain contracting the delicate mouth, you could easily guess how the inward thought was contrasting the sweet and elderly dame's face with the discontent of her young life. Forty years of quiet country ways, and that woman asked for nothing different than she was, she knew, whose age was scarce a score, weary, restless, and blase. The worst evil in that dame's life was change of locality, and a continuity in one place was the worst evil in hers.

"Don't you ever get tired?" she asked Dame Allen, raising her dreamy blue eyes to the calm face of the woman who was surveying her tray of golden butter with a face full of intense satisfaction.

"Tired of what?" asked Dame Allen, wonderingly.

"Of every thing," answered Essie Hicks. "Don't you ever get tired of the milk, and butter, and the table-setting, and dish-washing, and the drudging, and sweeping, till night, and—"

She paused suddenly. Upon her word she could not think of any thing else in that woman's life. It was only milk, and butter, and table-setting, and dish-washing, and drudgery all the time.

Dame Allen answered, "I never look at my work in that way. When Robert lived it was a comfort to work for him and please him, and when Robert died, there was my children to do for. It's always a comfort and a pleasure to work for those you love, Miss Hicks. There is nothing in the world to become as selfishness. I've always found it was better to work for other people than myself. I can't explain it; but you see, dear, you've got to work ourselves very well for the work we do for ourselves. Other people pays us better.

"I couldn't ever begin to pay myself for my own work as my husband paid me with his love and protection; and now that he's dead and gone, look at my children! Just look at 'em! They're a blessing and treasure he left to me every day of his life! God bless him! Dick's a boy to pay to the uttermost farthing that he owes me. He's a credit to me in money, and he does it in love. Dick's just like his father—just like his father!" And Dame Allen wiped away tears of pride, and love, and pain for the dead.

Essie Hicks followed Dame Allen's movements as she carried away the tray of butter as if she had thought no strange philosophy. And yet it struck her it was not altogether new. She had heard similar doctrine on Sundays sitting in her cushioned pew, and could bring now and then a word from the preacher's desk of One who went about doing good, but she had not listened as if the preacher's story of that self-sacrificing life had aught to do with her life of pleasure; and her neighbors' bonnets, and her own wardrobe and plans for Saratoga, took hold interestedly her more. Dame Allen's words more than the preacher's. Essie Hicks thinking of her life that had hitherto been one of self-seeking. She repeated the words again and again: "We don't pay ourselves very well for the work we do for ourselves. Other people pays us better." She began to believe it, recognizing in herself the dull paymaster, and she had never paid herself. She went to her work-basket and picked up a delicate piece of embroidery. She did not need it. She had spent hours upon it already. She would spend hours more; and when it was done she would not care for it. That was the way she paid herself. "Yes, I believe," she said to herself, "that other folks would pay me better. They couldn't pay me much more poorly than I pay myself."

Dame Allen returned to the kitchen, and, rolling up her sleeves, proceeded to knead a mass of spongy dough into shapely loaves of bread. Essie Hicks let her sewing drop and watched her.

"You've had to work very hard, haven't you?" she asked. The tone of inquiry was sympathetic. It was easy guessing that sympathy was an element of good in a character that in all human probability had run a risk of being spoiled. Dame Allen's answer was cheerful.

"I've seen pretty tough getting along sometimes, but I've never had more than my share. I was able to bear After my husband died, and I couldn't see no way but to sell the place, my heart most broke. Dick had been away to college a while then, you see. He took learning wonderful easy, and his father said he wanted him to take a higher place in the world than he had. Dick examined the books after his father died, and looked over all the notes and papers, and knew pretty well how affairs stood, but Dick had been away to school, and didn't know his father was as much encumbered as he was. He got very sober like as he looked over them papers, and went around the farm as if he bore the weight of the world on his shoulders. It was then I used to think of going away from the old spot where my husband brought me more than twenty years before. It seemed to me as if I had my root like the trees in our door-yard. But one night I seen Dick setting at the desk with little piles of paper all around him and his head bowed down over the desk so sorrowful like. I went and set down beside him, and says I, 'Dick, there ain't no use tryin' to keep the place. If your father was alive he would have been forehanded enough to make the next payment, but we can't do it. We'd better sell out, and go back to our people.' Them was the words one must take their chance.' Dick raised his head at that, and shook it in the sober like way he'd got when he was a child. He didn't want his old, jolly way now.' 'Mother,' he says, 'I've got a splendid notion.' He took up one of the piles of papers—the bond-bills he send they was. 'If father hadn't paid so much for my schoolin,' he says, 'I'd need a been money enough to pay off the mortgage. I can't do it now,' he says, 'but one must take their chance.' Then he went on and told me how old Squire Smith was goin' to advance the money, and he was goin' to take here and work the place. 'It will make you all a good living,' he said, 'and after a while the mortgage and the other debts will be paid off.' He's been at it ever since, Miss Hicks, paying off every cent amount as just as fast as he could make it. He's one to pay for his paternal farming, as I told you. He does it in money, and he does it in love."

"It's too bad your son couldn't remain at college," Essie Hicks remarked, and her tones were sympathetic for the son.

"It's a wonderful pity," assented Dame Allen. "He's such a hand for his books. Why, you ought to see the stacks of books he's got up in his room, and he's always reading and writing every spare minute he gets Ef you'd like any books at home, Miss Hicks, you'll find 'em up in Dick's room."

"Thank you," answered Essie Hicks. "I'll go right up and look at them, for I am not a book-to talk till the time ever since I've been here."

She went up the stairs with a bound to the low-ceiled, white-curtained room. What a simple room it was! She remembered the finish Dan Wykoff and Fred Douglas and Gus Livingston were always finding with their rooms at the hotels in Saratoga and Newport and Long Branch. What would they say to a room with carpet, furniture like Dick Allen's? She went to the bookrack, the stained boards and leather hangings of which bore witness to the fact that Dick Allen had been his own upholsterer; and then her eye ran over the books. There were series of histories, piles of scientific works, and volume after volume of Greek and Latin. Essie Hicks regarded the books with wonder. Greek and Latin—always mentioned her reasons, she often said, in a playful way, and it was her habit to bow to all mysterious things that she did not understand. She opened a book at random, and turned over the leaves meditatively. There were pencil marks on the pages, and some of the leaves were worn as if they had been subject to studious perusal. "It's quite remarkable," she said to herself, "that Dan Wykoff and Ben Douglas and Gus Livingston could be quite beyond their depth in books like these." She replaced the book upon the shelves, and went down without a book.

"Didn't you find any to suit?" asked Dame Allen.

"Oh! they were quite beyond me," answered Essie Hicks, with a laugh. "Your son must be a scholar." "A gentleman and a scholar," she quoted to herself; and then she wondered if it was an apt quotation. Dan Wykoff and Ben Douglas and Gus Livingston were gentlemen; but Dick Allen wore coarse clothes, and his face was sun-burnt, and his hands were rough. But then she thought of the Greek and Latin, and the story of self-sacrifice she had heard that morning, and she had a dim consciousness that in some way Dick Allen was superior to those others she had met in fashionable society.

A colored woman at the door, thrusting in her turbaned head, exclaimed, "Lad! Miss Allen, who's goin' for to take a cold bite to de men in de field? I've got de sass to clean for dinner, and you've got to tote eyes in dem pies. You hadn't ove to let de children all go to school, Miss Allen. Lad a massy! I'll be dumswizzled ef I know how under de sun and canopy de basket is to be got to de men. Now does yer know any way, Miss Allen?

"I will take it," said Essie Hicks, tossing her embroidery in a work-basket and springing to her feet.

"Lud, Miss! yer a pretty one to take it!" exclaimed the negro servant, surveying the young girl from head to foot. "You'll spile your gown, and them little shoes of yourn 'll be a sight to see after you've traipsed through the clover-fields."

"Oh no! it won't hurt my dress, and there are plenty more shoes where these came from," answered the girl, carelessly. She took a bag from the wall—a jaunty hat of braided straw, with a waving plume that touched her shoulder —and, picking up the basket, she started across the fields, singing—

"There was a little woman as I've heard tell,
She went to market her eggs for to sell."

"Dar's a fine little lady for yer," commented the negro servant, looking after the white-robed figure crossing the fields of clover. "But, den, fine fodders makes fine birds, and I'm sartain sure dey ain't any market for her eggs in this part of de country."

"She's an extromary young woman," remarked Dame Allen. "To think of her being interested in the price of butter and the like of that, when she never in all her life raised a finger toward earning her bread or assisting her mother."

"Will she stay all de summer long?" asked the negro servant.

"Mestress of de air agrees with her," answered Dame Allen. "She was pretty much run down, and her father thought a farm-house would be the best place in the world for her. Her father was brought up in these parts, and he come to me, and says he, 'Miss Allen, I'd be glad of your aid to help daughter for the summer. She's a little willful,' says he, 'but she hasn't known a mother's care since she was a little child, and it's a sad pity for girls when they lose their mothers.' 'That's the truth, Mr. Hicks,' says I, 'and it's a pity for boys and girls to lose their mothers, and their fathers, too, for that matter,' and I thought of my boys without any father. I never had a day's thinking on the farm when he ought to be in college, but I think it a great loss for a boy when his father dies. It's the Lord's will, though, and I didn't mean to complain. Eleven o'clock!' she exclaimed, as the eight-day clock gave forth eleven strokes. "It's high time the batch of bread was in the oven. Just look out of the window, Nancy, and see if Miss Hicks is findin' her way across the fields. These two days she haven't much gumption about any thing that don't concern their cookin' and worsted work, and fancy fixins of one kind and another."

"Lud, Miss Allen! de gal is makin' a bee-line for de men," answered Nancy, standing in the doorway, and shading her eyes from the sun. "What a lively little thing it is—as spry as a chipmunk! I guess Mister Richard 'll open his eyes to have dinner fotched him by dat little beauty, wid her ribbons a-flyin' and her fedders a-bobbin', like as though as of dey was alive, as it were. And bless us! she's a fine hand to walk, and no mistake. You needn't concern yourself any longer, Miss Allen; she's done got dar, and de men has got de cold bite, and de work in de kitchen has hadn't to stop a minute, cyin' alicgedder to Miss Hicks. Lud bless her!"

Dick Allen, turning an angle with a plow, thinking of the epithet "slow" applied to him by a pretty girl that morning—an epithet that rankled in his bosom because the girl who spoke it was wondrously pretty, and he did not like to stand condemned in her eyes as an old fogy and behind the times, glanced down the furrows of fresh turned sod, and saw the young girl coming with a basket. All the young man's face flushed crimson. He knew the kind of men and boys admired—men with white hands, and easy manners, and fashionable attire. He had known such men. It had been possible for him to stand among them had he disregarded the claims of the widow and the fatherless. But the widow was his mother, and the fatherless his own brothers. Not for such as he was disregard of these holy claims possible, and the crimson flush faded, and he raised his head with the conscious dignity of a true manhood, and met Essie Hicks's kindly blue eyes and reverent bow.

It was the Greek and Latin, and that giving up of college that brought the kindness in her eyes, and the reverence in her bow, she said to herself when she analyzed her mood. And now that Dick Allen gave her thanks with courteous kindness, she observed what fine eyes he had—"such a lovely shade of brown"—as she expressed it in true woman's parlance, and then what a noble forehead he had! If he dressed as well as Dan Wykoff, and Ben Douglass, and Gus Livingstone, he would be a handsomer man than either of them. She was coming to this conclusion slowly, asking questions about the land, and plows, and harrows. Her manner of interrogation was interested and sympathetic, like that in which she had talked to Dame Allen that morning of the price of butter and the best kneading. It was a manner that was every-day elicit interest from the party with whom she talked. It had won from Dame Allen the encomium of "extromary." It was winning from her son an honest admiration that beamed on his somewhat grave face and shone out of his honest brown eyes.

Essie Hicks's manner would have puzzled the girls of her set. Sue Douglass would have said, with a curl of her red lips, "That farmer lad! Pshaw!" Katie Cluk would have shrugged her fine shoulders and said, carelessly, "You know we don't care to bring down such game as that. It's a waste of ammunition, and the fun wouldn't pay for the powder." And Clara Jewett, who should have been a Vere de Vere herself, would have smiled in the cold way that is characteristic of the Vere de Veres and said, compl cently, "If Miss Hicks's health compels her to go out of the world and beyond the bounds of civilization, she is quite justifiable in getting all the amusement she can out of the people she meets. The pursuit of amusement is our inalienable right."

But Essie Hicks would have shamed the Vere de Vere reasoning. She had no thought of amusement standing before Dick Allen with a reverence in her face and a real interest in her manner that Dan Wykoff and Ben Douglass and Gus Livingstone would have given much to have awakened, and the young man comprehending somewhat of the reverence, and conscious only of the interest, forgot his sun-burnt face and hard hands and coarse garments and talked with Essie Hicks as he might have done if he had stood side by side with those other men that had fallen to her lot in life.

"It is a strange lot," Essie Hicks said, musingly, thinking seriously as men like Dick Allen could make her think, and talking earnestly as men like him could make her talk.

The young man's eye ran over the half plowed field.

"Rather a hard lot," he answered. "Though indeed it was pretty enough before the flowers were all turned under."

"You are very practical," Essie Hicks replied, with a smile. "I mean our lot in life. You mean this bit of land."

"My lot in life means this lot of land," Dick Allen said, with a strange bitterness in his speech. He turned almost abruptly from the young girl and laid his hands on the plow for the movement he seemed to turn from more than the girl. All the latent forces, the heart dreams, the boyish aspirations which that morning he had awakened and from which he turned. He was a young man, and he had his hand to the plow, and he could not look back.

Essie Hicks returned to the farm-house thinking of her father and of the days when Dr. Koffi and Douglasses and Livingstones and Clarks and Jewetts. And then she fell to thinking of Dick Allen. How the girls of her set would sneer at his coarse clothes and country manners! And how the gentlemen would stare at a man who worked and sowed and reaped and gathered bread for himself and others by literal sweat of his brow. Ah that brow! Essie Hicks's eyes grew misty and her face grew suffused over. She was thinking of the Greek and Latin books on the hanging shelves of leather and stained wood.

A few nights after, Essie Hicks, writing letters by the little table in Dame Allen's sitting room, glanced off her sheet to find Dick Allen's eyes fixed on her. She flushed a little, and with an fashionable society had all her nerves and blood-vessels under such control that she was never known to blush, and asked, kindly,

"What are you studying, Mr. Allen?"

"Greek," he answered, simply.

"It is always so," said Essie Hicks said, with a smile.

Dick Allen sighed. "And me," he muttered, inaudibly, laying his book on the table and walking to the window.

Essie Hicks picked up the book. It was a Latin Virgil.

"Why, he said it was Greek," she commented, inwardly, "and that is the enemy." She glanced up with questioning eyes. Dick Allen was regarding her attentively with an eager, thoughtful gaze. Her interest changed to intense. He meant her. It was an answer that sent the crimson current into her pale cheeks as she gathered up her writing and closed her portfolio.

"How much better you're looking, Miss Hicks!" said Dame Allen, aroused by Essie's appearance. "I think if your mother could see you he'd be pleased with the color in your face and the brightness of your eyes."

Poor mistaken Dame Allen! Essie Hicks's father could take no pleasure in color and brightness that a word and glance from your son had brought. And, Essie Hicks, you were not in sympathy with people of your kind—chatting with Sue Douglass, playing duets with Katie Clark, and congratulating Clara Jewett on her embroidery skill. You had better be waiting with Dan Wykoff, at Saratoga, or boating at Newport with Ben Douglass, or climbing the White Mountains with Gus Livingstone. You had better be anywhere than at Dame Allen's farm-house. It is a quiet, peaceful place, but there is danger in the quiet, and there are thorns beneath the roses. As for you, Dick Allen, you had better never have known Essie Hicks, with her pretty ways and sympathetic tones. Your path lies over rough places. Thinkest thou feet like Essie Hicks's shall bear thee company?

He did not think it. He was a practical man. He said to himself that Essie Hicks is a practical woman. When the summer is over Miss Hicks will be nothing to me. The farm-house will be nothing to Miss Hicks.

What trifles destroy our nice calculations!

It was only the giving way of a little piece of leather, the disarrangement of a bit of harness, and there was a frightened horse dashing over the dusty road, and behind the horse a frightened woman clinging to a gig, and in spite of every reason Dick Allen had said he would be very circumspect in that rule—it was the last, for the summer was well-nigh over, he forgot his resolution with those white arms clinging to him, and he said, tenderly, in the tones that lovers know,

"Be quiet, Essie, my darling, I would give my life for you."

When the danger was over, and Essie Hicks unhurt still cling to her protector, Dick Allen said, with a sad tenderness,

"I never meant to tell you all my heart. I said our ways were very different, and you could never share my life."

The crimson flush that made Essie Hicks beautiful above most women stole into her pale cheeks and her lips parted to make reply.

Dick Allen stopped her.

"I will not take your answer now," he said. "You are going to your home and friends for a few weeks. When you return you shall tell me if you are content to share my life."

"I shall be content," Essie Hicks answered. She had been thinking of Dame Allen's words, "She never yet ourselves was very well for the work we do for ourselves. Other people pays us better."

"I will work for Dick Allen, and I shall be content with Dick Allen's pay," she said to herself. She meant well; and Dick Allen saw angel hands bearing him over life's rough places.

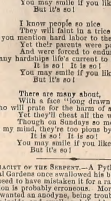
HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN EXCUSE FOR BEING QUARRELSOME.—In very hot weather you may be as disagreeable and dislodging to your friends as you please. If a coolness arises, so much the better.

PERSONAL.—There has been some difficulty about the right definition of "personal baggage" in terms issued by the railway companies. We should think a trunk that refused to shut up when you sat upon it an irritating baggage, but the offense does not involve personality. We see, however, that there is a tree-lug-bag advertised as "answering all purposes." It would depend, then, on the nature of the replies whether such luggage would be personal.

IT IS SO.

I've seen many a gift
Who would marry a chair
Provided he'd plenty of gold,
And a table prefer to repent
When the money was spent—
When she found that her heart had been sold.
It is so! It is so!
You may smile if you like,
But it's so!



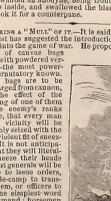
I've known many a lass
Who for wealth wedded lumpy pass
Whole hours parading the street,
While her mother would scrub
All the while at the tub,
Never minding the cold in the feet.
It is so! It is so!
You may smile if you like,
But it's so!

There is many a man
Who will "dress" if he can,
No matter how empty his purse;
And he'll cheat all the week,
When he settles his book,
But he's pattern for collar, or verse.
It is so! It is so!
You may smile if you like,
But it's so!

I know people so nice
They will dress in a trice
If you mention hard labor to them;
Yet their pockets are full,
And were forced to endure
Many hardships if forced to stem.
It is so! It is so!
You may smile if you like,
But it's so!

There are many about,
With a "love" they drawn out,"
Who will prate for the harm of a laugh;
But they'll cheat all the week,
Though on Sundays so meek—
To my mind, they're no pious by half.
It is so! It is so!
You may smile if you like,
But it's so!

SAGACITY OF THE SERPENT.—A Python at the Zoological Gardens once swallowed his blanket. He was very unwilling to disgorge it for a rabbit. This proposition is probably erroneous. More likely the Python was making his bed, being troubled with a pain in his inside, and swallowed the blanket because he could find no other bed-clothes.



MAKING A "MULE" OF IT.—It is said that a Prussian chemist has suggested the introduction of a new element into the service of war. He proposes the employment of curious bags filled with prussic acid, to be thrown over the enemy's ranks in the midst of battle. The moment any of them in its vicinity will be suddenly seized with the most violent fit of sneezing. It is not unlikely that they will literally "sneeze their heads off," but generals will be unable to issue orders, side-de-camp to transmit them, officers to give the simplest-word of command, horsemen will assess themselves out of their saddles, and taking aim will become a physical impossibility. A regiment of snuff-taking Highlanders might hold out a little longer; but it appears, from all accounts, that even the most seasoned veterans of "sneeshin" would be forced to succumb to the power of vertilla.—Meanwhile the Artillerists of the opposing forces would be mowing them down by hundreds, and nothing was left to the unfortunate victims of this diabolical scheme but to "surrender-sneeze."

A grim old judge, hearing a flowery discourse from a young Boston barrister, advised him to plow out the feathers from the wings of his imagination and stick them in the tail of his judgment.

CONFOUNDING.—Smith says he never minds hearing Hunter cut over-night, because he's always sure of getting "done up" in the morning.

GRAMMATICAL LOVE-LETTER IN POETRY.

Accept, Dear Miss, this article of mine,
Nor what's indelicate who can define!—
My case is singular, my house is rural,
My farm, unlimited, crowned to make it plural.
Something I feel pervades with system through,
I can't describe, yet substantively true.
My form so feminine, thy mind reflective—
Where all's possessive good, and naught objective.
No positive none can compare with thee
In all present perfect's decree—
Dear! person indicative, but prove—
Let thy self passive voice existing, I Love:
I'll leave cheerful mood no longer naive,
Nor let my senses both present, past, and future,
Think what voice torture must I undergo Till I obtain that thine I'm so.
Spare me the negative to save conjunction—
Oh, let my proposition meet conjunctive—
What could excite such pleasing recollection
As hearing thee positively answer, in order to "fill up,"
I will be thine, thy joys and griefs to share,
That heaven shall please to grant a period share.

FASHIONABLE BOARDING-HOUSES.

Rules for the Lady of the House.

1. A lady who keeps a boarding-house should impress the fact upon her inmates that they are totally dependent, and, as such, not entitled to the sympathies of life.

2. Let it be distinctly understood what the hours are for meals, and that the dinner table will never be kept waiting, no matter what the emergency.

3. Ladies should never be taken as boarders while there is any possibility of getting gentlemen; but when it is evident gentlemen are not to be had on reasonable terms, then let them understand that gentlemen would not have been decidedly preferred.

4. It is extremely necessary in this enlightened age to say, "Don't disturb children;" indeed, children being allowed to live in any house—except those owned by their papas—is a serious nuisance of boarders which should never be tolerated. Any proprietors of boarding-houses, therefore, who have children except to receive a friend, or to sell to boarders can not quite "enough" without any fanciful nicety.

5. Fish is a considerable item. The most approved modern plan to save this article is to have dinner put to very late in the season, and take them down very early; and if there be fish remains, to lay it out enough of cold to last till early spring.

7. When the lady of the house has a marriageable daughter the parlor should be appropriated for her especial use, evenings. Otherwise, for the entertainment of her beaux, gentlemen have no right to intrude in the parlor of a boarding-house except to receive a friend, especially after gaslight.

8. Let the boarders look out for their own comfort. Let your prices be the highest, and give as little as you possibly can in return. Let the table-cloth not at the regular meal-time, be an extra. Go late to market. There is a great saving in this. Let the meat cook burglars in meats and vegetables. It don't matter about them much, only fetch for them. Hotels, restaurants and other like cheap cobalts make excellent hashes, and are very often found to be better in every way than Dessette are very expensive. Many people eat a pie three very small pieces for each one of it. Save very small dishes for castards, and let them be but two-thirds full. For your puddings, etc., instead of having different plates, have the smallest-sized saucers; no one will know the difference. Your reputation will ever ask for a second supply of dessert.

PUN-GENT QUERIES.

Which is most to be pitied—a pen-sive lady or an expensive one?

Is it necessary for a "limb of the law" to "branch out" in frock-line oratory?

Is "reeling and writhing thunder," to lighten the labor of writing, considered a canonical or civil "write?"

Can a printer who "sticks" type be said to adhere to his profession?

Is a "row" sort of farmer a good grain-raiser?

Is haughty-culture commendable in farmers' daughters?

When a dog insists upon lying on the "mat," would you consider him "dog-matical?" Why not?

If mankind are animals, can fashionable ladies be called "creatures of animals?"

If "brevity is the soul of wit," what a funny thing a fashionable coat is, isn't it?

What kind of riches can not "take to themselves wings and fly away?"—Why, ox-citing, of course!

Among the gifts to a newly married pair at a town in New Jersey, the other even ng, was a broom sent to the lady, accompanied with the following sentiment:

"This trifling gift accept from me,
'Tis use I would commend;
That you may use the broom yourself,
In storms the other end."

SKETCHES OF NEW YORK CITY LIFE—"BOY WANTED!"

SKETCHES OF CITY LIFE.

"Boy wanted!" says the sign. But to judge from the above illustration, there is no lack of the needed article. Boys—why there don't seem to be any thing else! To some youngster in that crowd the call may have come, like a pleasant invitation, to give up idling and begin a life of industry; and years hence that sign, or the advertisement seen in the morning paper, may be recollected by him as the turning-point in his life, and seem as illustrious as if printed in letters of gold. Or the advertisement may have met the eyes of some poor starveling, who wants a chance to live; and to him it means a possible succession of dinners, and of nights spent in a comfortable bed. Our artist has shown the kind of answer which these advertisements receive. These boys are not all of the street. There are in this city hundreds of boys, sons of respectable parents and regular attendants of our schools, who every morning look in the daily papers for those two magic words, "Boy wanted!" and if they are successful in their search, the earliest possible moment finds them mingling with the crowd sketched by our artist—a crowd which fills the street for a considerable distance, and which winds up the staircase to the very door of the advertising proprietor who has had the audacity to raise and brave this storm of boys. He selects the boy who best meets his fancy, and then the crowd disperses. At this time, when business is so stagnant, there is a slim chance for boys who want places. Be patient, boys! You are all wanted, and sooner or later the call will come for each one of you. Take the chance when it comes, and then work on, and patiently wait your employer's call to "come up higher."

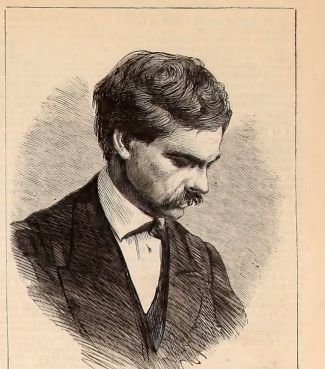
Our other sketch—"Hot Corn!"—introduces us to a night-scene in summer-time—a scene familiar to every one who has taken a midnight stroll among the by-ways of this city.

THE LATE CHARLES L. ELLIOTT.

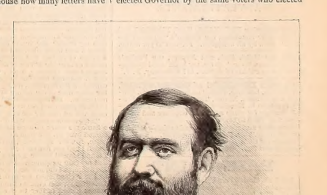


THE decease of MR. ELLIOTT has deprived this country of her most distinguished portrait-painter. He died in Albany on Tuesday, August 25, from a tumor on the brain. MR. ELLIOTT was born in Scipio, New York, in 1812. His early years were passed for the most part in Syracuse. His father, an architect, wished him to enter upon mercantile pursuits. That did not satisfy the boy, and he came to New York, where he studied art under TRUMBULL and a painter named QUIMBY. He tried portraits, but was not successful. He illustrated IRVING and PAULDING; but at last went into the interior of the State, where he devoted his undivided attention to portrait-painting. Then he returned to New York, where he has lived and painted ever since. One of his most characteristic portraits—that of FLETCHER HARPER—was sent to the PARIS Exhibition. One of the best art-critics in this country thus described his portraits in a former Number of this journal: "ELLIOTT'S portraits are dashing and brilliant. They are often roughly criticised for crudity and extravagance of color. But although like GILBERT STUART he is fond of color, like GILBERT STUART he is a master of color. Perhaps the secret of his great popularity as a painter is the vividness of his portraiture. The critic may call it a superficial likeness, but it is a likeness so graphic that it is saluted with an involuntary smile of recognition and pleasure. Then there is a magnetism in his portraits: an air of cheerfulness and high spirits which is enlivening and delightful; and if his companions of other days still speak of him fondly as 'CHARLEY ELLIOTT,' it is because the boy's heart still beats unchanged in the busy and famous painter."

REMAINS OF CHARLES L. ELLIOTT LYING IN STATE AT THE ACADEMY OF DESIGN, NEW YORK CITY.—[FROM A DRAWING BY ROBINSON.]

A MAGICIAN'S RESIDENCE.

ELECTRICITY is a wizard's power. With it, and a little mechanical skill, a man may turn his house into a magician's castle. The late ingenious MR. Appold—of centrifugal pump fame—indeed, did this without it. His room doors opened as you approached them, and shut behind you; his stable gates did the same; upon touching a spring the window-shutters closed and the gas was turned on; his apartments maintained themselves at a uniform temperature, and a proper hygrometric state, by regulating thermometers and atmospheric damping apparatus; in short, his house was full of surprising devices, created and worked out by his wonderful inventive and mechanical skill. Heal he pressed the subtle fluid into his service there is no saying into what a palace of enchantment his dwelling would have been transformed. But what he did not do has been done by the famous Robert Houdin, who has made electricity do the work of a retinue of servants and a watchman to boot. The ex-conjuror lives at a country seat called the Priory, near to his native town of Blois, and there it is that those wonderful applications have been effected. A visitor presenting himself at the portal finds the name of "Robert Houdin" on a brass plate, above which is a little knocker; operating upon the latter a great bell sounds within the house. In a few moments the lock is thrown back, and the name on the plate changes, like a pantomime trick, to "Entrez." The visitor obeys, and the door automatically closes behind him. If more than one person enters, the invisible and inanimate "concierge" makes known the fact by tinkling a small bell, which keeps up its tintinnabulum so long as the door is held open. The carriage-gates, some distance off, announce themselves open or shut in the hall, where an inscription exhibits the words, "The gates are open," or "The gates are shut," as the case may be. The letter-box on the gate tells in the house how many letters have been put into it, and, by an arrangement with the postman, which are letters and which book-parcels or newspapers: and if the postman is wanted at the house to carry correspondence to the village, he is apprised of the fact by a bell, of the ringing of which he knows the meaning. The horse, in a stable more than forty yards from the house, is fed at regular intervals by electrical intervention. At stated times a clock sends a current, which opens the orifice of a shoot or hopper, and allows the due proportion of provender to fall into the manger. This same clock is charged with the transmission of time to two large external dials, and to several smaller ones about the domicile, all of which go together in sympathy, so that Father Time has here a company of subalterns that march step by step with irreforgable order. Then it rings bells at the proper times for meals and other regular household duties, calls up the servants by alarms in the morning, and at night puts a galvanic current in connection with a wire that communicates with all the doors and windows, so that if any of these are attempted by burglars an alarm is instantly given. Lastly, the green-house telegraphs its temperature to the conjuror's study. If the gardener allows the thermometer to rise above or fall below certain limits, his master is apprised of the irregularity, and he is called to account next morning. The poor man knows when he has been at fault, but does not know who or what tells the tale, and he thinks he has a sorcerer to serve; and so, in the only sense in which we can nowadays regard the word, he has.



HON. H. C. WARMOTH, GOVERNOR OF LOUISIANA.

LOUISIANA AND GEORGIA.

THESE are both reconstructed States. In the elections held last spring the HON. H. C. WARMOTH was elected Governor of Louisiana, and MR. BULLOCK Governor of Georgia. The majority in Georgia in favor of the new Constitution was over 17,000; in Louisiana nearly 18,000. Owing to the larger negro vote in Louisiana, the candidate for Governor was a more pronounced Radical. This candidate was claimed by the Radical Republicans in 1865 as the delegate from the "Territory of Louisiana." When Louisiana was first organized as a State Government under MR. LINCOLN'S administration, the Senators and Members of Congress from that State were admitted. The admission of representatives was, however, refused by a subsequent Congress.

In Georgia, where almost every thing depended upon the white vote, a more conservative candidate was presented. Thus MR. BULLOCK was elected Governor by the same voters who elected a Legislature about equally divided as between Republicans and Democrats.

The policy which has been adopted by Louisiana and Georgia, by both the Governors and the Legislatures of those States—particularly of the latter—has been far from extreme. Earnest efforts have been made to assure the whites that nothing more was asked of them than to assent to the Congressional plan of restoration, and that their condition of political power will secure them a release from any political disabilities resulting from rebellion. Owing to the opposition of such men as HOWELL COBB, these efforts have in Georgia been for the most part fruitless; while in Louisiana, where the opposition of the late Confederates has been still more virulent, there is scarcely any hope of reconciliation between the two parties, except through an overwhelming majority for General GRANT in the impending Presidential election. Such a majority—particularly if it comes chiefly from the Northern States—will bring the opposition to its senses, and conduce to its acceptance of the situation. This will result in the great objects which the Republicans throughout the country now have in view—permanent peace and a perfect reconciliation. If, however, the Democracy succeed in the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR, the vexed questions which have disturbed the nation for four years will continue to agitate the country during another administration. Let all Southern voters who desire the speedy return of peace and prosperity in their section remember this. If they really desire the perpetuation of discord and disturbance, they will most surely help on that result by voting the Democratic ticket.

We believe the officers of the MANHATTAN to be honest and responsible, and their plan fairly set forth in their prospectus, to which we direct those contemplating Life Insurance, leaving each to judge for himself.—N. Y. Tribune (Aug. 11). See Prospectus on this page.

ALMOST MIRACULOUS.—We seldom indorse a man in our editorial columns, however, unless convinced that he is deserving, and to speak well of him will result in benefit to the public. It is with this idea that we call attention to the advertisement of Dr. J. A. SHERMAN, No. 697 Broadway, New York, who is performing cures for Hernia, or Rupture, but little less than miraculous, and never before, so far as we know, attempted or accomplished by any other surgeon. We have seen with our own eyes seen his cures—are acquainted with men he has brought to health from a living death, and can assure the public that it is perfectly safe to consult with or call upon him. A more meritorious physician does not live.—Home Journal (Reduction in this week.) Democrat was handed in to us by Geo. Hodges, of Hodges Mills, Ohio, who is afflicted with Rupture. Dr. Sherman, as he gave abundant proof, and to it we can add our testimony, has those afflicted with them as if they seek relief and comfort.—La Crosse Democrat.

The following is a statement of Mr. Hodges alluded to in the above article:

TERRIBLE SUFFERINGS FROM RUPTURE, AND FINAL CURE OF GEORGE HODGES, Esq.

READ HIS STATEMENT.

"When a boy, about nine years of age, I became ruptured on both sides, and my parents, anxious for my good, procured the advice and aid of a Dr. Hall, a physician, who procured and adjusted to me a truss, which I wore from that time for his unpretending, without being benefited by it. My parents then sought for relief, but to no purpose, for new trusts after the other seemed to increase my trouble. When about fifteen years of age, I was my fortune to visit Londonderry, where I hoped to find a suitable truss for my relief, but was doomed to disappointment, for there I could wear that would retain it. The next opportunity I had was in the city of Philadelphia, where the most celebrated truss readers, among whom were the gentlemen in charge of the Pennsylvania Hospital, with a feeling of humanity, pride, or profit, exhausted all their ability in applying to me their different trusses.

"I tried Dr. Rigg's Hard Rubber Truss, which was painful, and answering the purpose of relief.

"I applied to Dr. Gregory, No. 609 Broadway, who seemed to be very confident that he could relieve my case, and declared it to be the worst rupture that he had ever seen, and continued to wear his truss for twelve years; and after vainly trying on several of Dr. Wright's trusses, I gave up in despair, and left my case was a hopeless one, and if I didn't find some relief it would ruin me under the weight. I was then a year; that he could do nothing for me; wouldn't undertake to, and that if any body did, they would only take my money without doing me any good.

"I called on Dr. Sherman, No. 697 Broadway, who arranged and fitted on several of his patent trusses, to my satisfaction. Notwithstanding he put me to some with great pressure, they did not support my case, and he gave it up, remarking that he was sorry that I could find any thing to do me any good; my rupture was so bad, he did not see how I could be raised to live so long with it.

"After this my attention was directed to Dr. Marsh, of the Astor House, Vesey Street, and I called to see him. He fitted me with trusses, which proved to be of no use. He then decided that his $40 radical cure truss would do, but after trying it for a week I left his office feeling rather dubious, yet without I returned in a day or two, and told Dr. Marsh that I would see me again as though he meant this time to conquer; that he could not be worse than he was, and in my case, for his radical cure truss, though adjusted, readjusted, and readjusted again, was of no use to me; it could not retain my rupture, although it was applied with pitiless force. Dr. Marsh, after trying my case, remarked, 'You are in a critical condition; it is a wonder you have lived as long as you have, sir.' I was again compelled to leave his office doubly disappointed and discouraged. Life was a burden to me, and fate, yet not abandoning my efforts, a medical friend brought me to Dr. Sherman's office, No. 697 Broadway, New York, and I did so. Dr. Sherman, after learning my case, and having had a look at several of his patent trusses, all of which failed to fit me, said he would undertake to relieve me of my rupture, fixed up one with terrible pressure, which served to hold me, but not to support the rupture, for I succeeded as though it would cut me in two in an hour. I never saw a man more astonished than Dr. Sherman, and it was the best he could do; my case was a very bad one.

"Receiving a circular of the Elastic Truss Company, No. 474 Broadway, I called upon them, and was called there to see the Superintendent, Dr. Dike, who also was astonished at my case, and declared it was without hoping my rupture at all.

"I then, in despair, called to a notice of Dr. E. A. Foote, Lexington Avenue, corner of Twenty-eighth Street, I went to see him, but his attempts to retain my rupture so bad, would not undertake to do any thing for it. That was, indeed, disheartening, and almost forced me to the conclusion that my life and happiness were blighted with misery. But, as fate has looks brighter after the most terrific storm, so, after the most terrible disappointments and trials of life, the light of science burst upon me brightest through Dr. Sherman and several others, and I called on him before alluded to. Dr. Sayre advised me by all means to go to Dr. Sherman, and I went to see him, and to come back and let him see me after I got fixed.

"Dr. Sherman fitted me with a truss, which put a flame the spark of hope kindled in me when I first looked over the advertisement of Dr. Sherman in this office, No. 697 Broadway, with a snap of hoping to find him and get relief for my terrible sufferings. I found several before me, but I waited my turn; and my case was examined, and the same decision by Dr. Sherman I did not have the same feelings of dread, but of hope and confidence in the man. Dr. Sherman, Dr. Gregory, and others examined me, which circumstance would have driven me desperate, but for the opinion that I had at last fortunately found some one equal to the task of relieving me. Dr. Sherman, after examination Dr. Sherman gave a more favorable opinion than I had ever heard from any one, and he accomplished, and expressed himself is such sanguine terms that I put myself in his hands, and am now, and have been since that day, a new man, capable of taking the most active exercise without any inconvenience whatever from my rupture. I am now, practically, a sound man, and consider it to be my duty to do so.

"As Dr. Sayre requested me to call and let him see what Dr. Sherman could do, I went to his office, and after proving Dr. Sherman's method a few days, he told me that Dr. Sherman was a friend of his, examined me, and was very much pleased, expressing his satisfaction in very strong terms, saying, adding, 'When I first saw your rupture I was afraid that you would die before I got you relieved, but I am glad you have got here.'

"The way that I have been treated since my rupture first appeared, and the many attempts to relieve me, attempted to relieve me, in view of the relief that I have recently received from Dr. Sherman, forces me to the conclusion that it is not the incurability of my rupture, but the bad treatment by injurious pressure the ruptured patient receives, which fastens to him the curse for life, or hurls him with the horrors of strangulated rupture to a premature grave.

"That the reader may more fully realize the horrible condition that I was in when I placed myself in the hands of Dr. Sherman, I would recommend him to see my photographs, taken by order of Dr. Sherman before and after treatment, which may be seen at his office.

MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

OFFICE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
No. 432 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

THE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is incorporated by the State of New York.

OBJECT.

The object of this Association is to secure a cash payment within forty days after the death of a member of as many families as may be members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.

MEMBERSHIP FEES.

The membership fees are six dollars at joining (i. e. which a policy will be furnished), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which due notice will be given. One dollar from each member goes to the widow or heirs of the deceased member, and the ten cents to the expenses of collecting.

INVESTMENTS.

The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the moneys received by the Association shall be made a sinking fund to meet payments falling due by the delinquencies of members. This fund is held by the

and will be invested in United States Bonds, or real estate, or bond and mortgage, for the benefit of the property, which property shall be double the value of the money so loaned.

THE FUNDS.

The remaining two thirds, after paying the expenses of the Association, will be invested in real estate in the City of New York, or in bond and mortgage on property in the City of New York, the interest of which shall go to pay the current expenses of the Association. When a member leaves an heir, the money becomes the property of the Association, with the privilege that the person so left shall be paid out of such funds—said expenses, however, not to exceed ten per centum.

A member failing to pay his fee of one dollar and ten cents within thirty days from date of notice, forfeits all claims upon the Association, and also forfeits all previous payments to it. At the Pacific decease this time is extended to sixty days. A member having no permanent residence, or who is about to remove, may appoint a representative to pay his fees.

Each member of society may also send ten dollars and fifty cents to the Treasurer to prepay their fees, which will be credited to them, thus saving the trouble of sending $1 10 each time, besides a saving of fifty cents. There is no poor that he can not pay $6 now, and $1 10 occasionally, this saving $5000 to his heirs. The average number of deaths each person will have to pay to secure $5000 will be $20 per year, a little over fifty cents per week. The whole benefits of insurance cost about one sixth what they would have to pay for the same insurance annually for a $5000 policy.

The company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women. As soon as these classes are filled five more will be adopted. Men and women are not allowed in the same classes. Every living lie above sixteen years is eligible.

CLASSES.

In class A all persons betw'n the ages of 15 and 21 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 21 and 26 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 26 and 30 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 40 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 45 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 50 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 55 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 60 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 65 yrs.

The classes for women are the same as above. Any one that is behind in his or her pay monthly will be expelled, and the moneys paid forfeited to the Association. Each class will be limited to 5000 members. Any person pays $6 upon becoming a member, and $1 10 monthly thereafter, and belonging to the class according to what may be a member of.

A member of one class can not be assessed this dollar of a member of another class dies. Each class is independent, having no connection with the others.

ILLUSTRATION.

Class "A" has 5000 members. A man dies. The Association pays over, within forty days, $5000 to the widow, heirs, or assigns. Each living members forward, within thirty days, $1 10 each to the Treasurer, which will be $5500. We send this sum, they forfeit to the Association all moneys paid, and their place is vacant, and we have to fill the place of the deceased.

ADVANTAGES.

The advantages of this Association over ordinary Life Insurance Companies are, no panics can break it; the fees are so small they need to be paid at short intervals, that any man can secure to his family a competency without distress.

HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.

Any one desiring to become a member must send $6, in check, bank draft, postal order, or by express, to the Treasurer, at the office of the Association. Under circumstances will the Association be responsible for money sent by mail. Agents are not authorized to receive moneys, but must ask for checks, &c., &c. Applicants will receive a receipt, which they will keep at their own risk. All checks, &c., must be payable to the order of the Treasurer. Persons intending paying the money must be a paper giving the applicant's name in full book, residence, occupation, and to which the policy is in favor of, post-office address, and the class desired to enter. Certificate, setting forth the physical condition, and whether, in the opinion of the examiner, the applicant is a proper person to be insured. Blank forms of application for membership will be furnished by the Association.

Agents are not allowed to receive money but in the form of a check or draft, and must be made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 30 cents, 35 cents, 38 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED COFFEE, 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 20c., 30c., 33c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money Order with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant in all cases, and will give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense, and the money will have the money refunded.

N.B.—Residents of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can economize in their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending direct to us.

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, have copied our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be informed that we are not connected with, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as none to be addressed. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

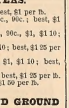
ESTABLISHED 1853.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly-discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and as well polished as the best gold ones. These watches are made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and nearly good for times, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $3 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money may not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. E. JONES & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N.Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).



☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide Watches, consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

Medical Hints for the Fall.

The semi-annual shaking in the Fever and Ague districts has begun. The fogs of these Autumn nights and mornings, charged with the elements of intermittent and bilious remittent fevers, and, unfortunately, two thirds of the community are just in the condition to be disastrously affected by them. Those who have been prudent enough to fortify themselves during the Summer with that powerful and infallible vegetable invigorant—are fore-armed against malaria, and have nothing to fear. But health is the last thing too many think about. In the pursuit of gain or pleasure, the blessing, without which wealth is dross and enjoyment impossible, is neglected.

Better late than never is a consolatory proverb, however, and all who begin to feel the premonitory symptoms of any of the ailments which are engendered by the malaria of Autumn, should immediately resort to the GREAT PROTECTIVE AND CURE OF THE AGE. A few doses of the BITTERS will break up the chills and prevent their recurrence. In every region where intermittent prevail the purest and best of all vegetable tonics is indispensable. Of all anti-bilious preparations known to the most effective and harmless, it does not stimulate the liver violently, like the mineral salivants, but tones, renovates, and regulates the organ without exciting any general disturbance of the system, or entailing any reaction. The BITTERS are essentially a household remedy, and should be in ways within reach, as the very best means of preventing and checking bilious attacks and intermittent fevers.

Alaska Diamonds.

A newly-discovered transparent substance, for which we are the only agents for the United States. Equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, from which it can not be detected. They are mounted at our own factory, in the latest and most fashionable styles, guaranteed fine gold, and sold by us at one fifteenth the cost of diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Solitaire Earrings, per pair, $8 and $6; Solitaire Pin per Rings, $8, $6, and $4; Solitaire Gents' Bosom Pins, $5, $3, $3, and $2; Solitaire Gents' Studs, per set, $3 and $2. Cluster Earring Pins, $5, $6, and $8; Cluster Pin and Earrings, per set, $6, $10, and $25; Cluster Diamond Rings, $5 and $8.

We wish it to be distinctly understood that we are not classified with the various humbugs of New York, and prefer to do our business direct from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry.

☞ Orders less than $5 must be accompanied with the cash. Over $5 may be sent when goods sent free. Orders exceeding that amount by express, for collection on delivery, customers paying all express charges.

Elgin Watches.

The NATIONAL WATCH CO., Elgin, Ills.

The General and Departmental Superintendents of the National Watch Company, of ELGIN, ILLINOIS, are will known as men who have previously been in the employ of the largest of the old companies, designing and operating their Machinery, and contributing mainly to their success. These gentlemen now have a co-operative as well as a salaried interest in bettering their past achievements.

Profiting by their former abundant experience, they have, with unlimited Capital at their disposal, spent over three years in constructing Improved Machinery, and remedying such defects in the old as their riper judgment has detected.

Placed in the market in 1867, the ELGIN WATCHES have been received with unprecedented favor, and are pronounced by watchmakers, East and West, as superior in to any others that can be purchased at corresponding prices of either American or foreign manufacture.

Design, Finish, and Durability

Six styles are now in market bearing our trade-mark.

Call on your Jeweler and ask to see them.

CHICAGO, October 21*st*, 1867.

NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY:

Having carefully examined and tested your Watches, we find them perfect in all their parts, of fine finish, and well adapted to the wants of the time-keeping public. WE CONSIDER THEM THE BEST MADE WATCHES IN AMERICA, FOR THE PRICE, and equal to the finest European Watches, for accurate time, THEY COST DOUBLE OR THREE TIMES THE MONEY. We cheerfully recommend them to all parties wishing good time-keepers.

LAPORTE'S
PARIS KID GLOVES.

No. 18 RUE PIERRE LEVEE, PARIS, July 1, 1868.
Messrs. FISK, CLARK, & FLAGG, New York:
GENTLEMEN,—It has occurred to me that in introducing my Gloves for sale in your market, a few facts in support of my claims upon the consideration of your customers would be very opportune at this time.

Upon the introduction of a Glove into a foreign market, it requires a certain number of years of trial to establish its reputation. This has been the case with most Gloves heretofore offered for sale in America, as the public had no other means of judging of their merits.

Desiring that my fabrication should be placed in its proper position before your people, as a first-class Glove, without undergoing the usual tedious process of cautious trial to which all new makes have to submit which (unlike my own) have not an established reputation, I feel fully confident they will at once, upon their own merits, obtain that high position in the estimation of the American public to which they have attained in England.

In consideration of the foregoing facts, I deem it advisable to forward you a list of distinguished personages in England who, among many others, have worn my Gloves for several years, and whose special measures for a supply of the same are now in my possession, having been forwarded me through my London agents.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
LAPORTE.

Personages above alluded to who are supplied with the "LAPORTE KID GLOVE," made from their special measures furnished to Monsieur Laporte:

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.
THE ROYAL FAMILY OF ENGLAND.
THE PRINCESS ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.
LADY PALMERSTON.
COUNTESS OF STAMFORD.

THE "WICKEDEST MAN'S" REFORMATION.

THE famous and infamous dance-house at 804 Water Street, New York, of which we gave a truthful account some weeks ago, was closed at midnight on August 30, and a notice posted on the door to the effect that it would be opened only for the hire of Magdalens to honest service. It is very gratifying to know that the place is closed; and still more gratifying and encouraging to know the reasons that influenced the act. JOHN ALLEN, the keeper, is reported to have said that he had closed his place because he had "come to the conclusion that it is wrong to keep such a place; and also to gratify his poor old father, who is tottering on the brink of the grave, and his brothers and sisters, who are all respectable people; and also for the sake of his children, to whom he wants to set a good example." The former reason given by him for promising to close the place, namely, "that the business was ruined," was not calculated to make one believe in the sincerity of the religious views claimed for, but not by, him. Undoubtedly his conduct since the close of the house has been such as to lead one to believe as well as hope in his reformation. Certainly his conduct if not his example is calculated to purge Water Street of the many pernicious establishments like his own which are to be found there; and if the Superintendent of Police will vigorously reinforce the ministers now laboring in that district by a few policemen, with orders to close up the other establishments immediately, great good will undoubtedly be effected in cleaning that district. It may look a little arbitrary at first glance to close these establishments by force, and it may be doing the individuals who keep them a legal wrong, but these people prosper by illegally robbing poor sailors, and the sailors are certainly entitled to as much protection as the city sharks who prey upon them. Besides, these establishments are in part indirectly supported by all tax-payers, and justice to the tax-payer demands that they should be closed. Men and women are daily sent from these haunts of vice to our hospitals to be cured of diseases generated there, and the expense to the city of taking care of the victims of the keepers of these dance and drinking houses is no small item in the expense account which the citizens of New York are taxed heavily to pay. These pecuniary reasons are only second in importance to the moral ones which might be adduced, if necessary; but they are certainly worthy of consideration.

ALLEN'S old dance-hall has been open for the purposes of prayer daily since September 1. A reporter of the Tribune of September 3 thus describes the scenes, as we illustrate them on this page:

"The stranger who passed through Water Street at noon yesterday must have been impressed with the fact that something unusual was going on there. While other portions of the street presented their wonted appearance, with half-clad, fat, greasy-looking women, coarse, bloated, brutal men, and dirty, ragged children, lounging around in unhealthy idleness, this street is now thronged with people. By the mire of the gutters, the sidewalks between Dover and Roosevelt streets were occupied by knots of men, porters, sailors, dandy longshoremen, bar-tenders, mingled with whom were noisy, well-dressed clerks, merchants, and disgus-bandaging women with sickly children in their arms. JOHN ALLEN, who, when he was formerly in session, was literally packed with men, representing almost every class in society, and the crowd extended across the sidewalk into the middle of the street. At the further side of the inner room of the establishment were a number of clergymen—who conducted the exercises—besides a number of Wall Street bankers and brokers who are in sympathy with the revival movement in Water Street, and who have promised that funds shall not be wanting to carry forward the efforts for the evangelization of the Fourth Ward. The exercises were characterized by great earnestness on the part of those who participated, and the interest manifested by all who were present. Hardened criminals were moved to tears, and joined in the hymns with a fervor rarely seen except in camp-meetings. Of course, mixed up with these was much profanity, scoffing, and sneering at 'JOHN'S last dodge;' but the general impression was that Mr. ALLEN was in earnest in his professions, and that a movement had been inaugurated in Water Street that is to work a revolution there as salutary as the one that has taken place at the Five Points during the last decade. Not among the least interested of the audience were the young women of the extremely immoral district of Water. They were dressed in their holiday attire, and joined in the singing with much apparent fervor, and listened attentively to all that was said and done. The little CARUSOS were also the centre of much attraction."

TO THE Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX.

UNDER the Flag I greet you, Sir,
As one who in your country's cause
With steadfast zeal have toiled for her,
Her Constitution, and her laws.

Who in her Council-Hall arose,
Riding imperiled the debate,
Yet never stooped to screen her foes,
Nor brought dishonor to the State;

Striving aright her course to guide,
With that true bard of noble ease,
Who took their stand by Lincoln's side,
And never faltered back again.

I greet you as an honest man,
Loyal, and resolute, and just,
Who standeth long in Freedom's van,
Have never yet betrayed your trust.

SHALL THE LOST CAUSE BE REGAINED?

IT is sometimes alleged that the Republican orators and papers dwell too much upon old issues in this campaign, while the election is to be decided upon new ones. But what is the paramount issue of the canvass, and who raised it? It is whether the cause lost in the field shall be regained at the polls. And this question is forced upon the country by the Democratic party, under the control of those who frankly declare that the cause of the rebellion is not lost. Inevitably, therefore, the characters and careers of those who hope to obtain possession of the Government become the important subjects of consideration.

If the Democratic party had said that, acquiescing in the results of the war, and accepting the reconstruction of the Union by Congress as a settled fact, it would make the best of it, and had asked power upon the promise of greater economy, and of taking no step except in the most legal and peaceful manner, and had thus nominated men whose names and words were a vindication of its sincerity, the canvass would necessarily have been conducted very differently.

But what are the facts? The strongest candidate in the Convention was Mr. PENDLETON, an original secessionist and repudiator. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, his colleague, one of the most notoriously disloyal men in the country, put Mr. PENDLETON'S scheme of public dishonor into the resolutions. He and his chief opposed the war, and hoped the rebellion would succeed. But it failed, and the next service they could do for the late rebels was to refuse to pay the cost of subduing them. This is the financial policy of the party. Should it prevail the country is disgraced by those who tried in vain to destroy it. And of the effort at destruction PENDLETON and VALLANDIGHAM are as guilty as FORREST and HOWELL COBB—each having worked in his own way.

What next? Wade HAMPTON, one of the bitterest of the late rebels, stops at General LEE'S college on his way to the Convention and says that the cause is not lost. He comes into the Convention; is appointed upon the Committee of Resolutions; introduces a declaration that the reconstruction laws are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, and the other members pledge themselves to support the declaration to the end. The Convention then nominates for President an opponent of the war, who said that the success of the Government would be as revolutionary as that of the rebellion, and for Vice-President an ex-Union soldier, not because of that fact, but because he had just vehemently demanded that the Executive, without even consulting Congress or the Supreme Court, should by force overthrow the reconstructed governments in the Southern States. The Convention thus absolutely controlled by the most resolute rebels and the most reckless repudiators adjourns. The Southern States are instantly aflame with the speeches of the most virulent of the rebel chiefs, who can not restrain the expression of their intense hatred for the political organization of the party that conducted the war to a successful end, and which has founded reconstruction upon equal rights. They exultingly affirm that the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR will give them the success which they missed in the field. RAPHAEL SEMMES, FORREST, JOHN FORSYTH, ALBERT PIKE—the most malignant enemies of the Union and of equal rights, assert either that they still hate the Union or that the rebellion was a defense of the Constitution. VALLANDIGHAM is nominated for Congress, PENDLETON is the chosen hero of the canvass. The party papers that ventured to hope before the Convention met that it would dissolve without something are kicked into obedience, and pour upon General GRANT a torrent of indecent personal abuse; and grave orators, like Mr. PUGH, denounce reconstruction as a outrage" to be "upset" by the Democrats, and "if it means war, let it come."

Now, in view of an issue of a violent overthrow of the laws by an Executive elected by those who were lately in open rebellion, and who still glory in it, what can any sane citizen do but absolutely discredit these facts? His first duty is to show that this issue is the rebellion under a new face; that the Democratic talk about taxation is merely an appeal to one of the most sensitive and selfish parts of means of obtaining power, not for the purpose of diminishing taxes by increasing production, and so making it easy to support the Republican ring them altogether and ruining the national credit. His duty is to show, further, that this power is sought not to pacify the country, but to restore the late rebels to the control of the Southern States, and to disable the loyal population there. In a word, it is his most urgent duty to show that the whole Democratic policy is to undo, as far as possible, every thing that the war has done, and to restore the intolerable situation of affairs before the war began.

And this is what the Democratic party, by its orators and papers, is every where showing. They state incontrovertibly that we must first determine whether the reconstruction decreed by those who won in the war is to stand, before we consider what the next step shall be. In a free country when a party enters upon a canvass with the declaration that its success will set aside the most vital and comprehensive laws by force, it raises a simple issue of civil war; and those who permit themselves to be diverted to minor issues do not see that this involves all other questions of interest and "pocket," are, however honestly, the Bourbons who learn nothing, and who forget nothing. It didn't believe there was going to be much of a shower. After the experience we have had no one is justified in being deceived.

PROSPECTS.

THE result of the election in Vermont is very significant. It was only a State election, but the majority is almost as large as that of Mr. LINCOLN in 1864. The meaning of such a fact is very evident. It is that the people fully appreciate the gravity of the Presidential canvass, and do not mean to surrender to political intrigue what they refused to hostile arms.

Before every Republican election there is a curious swaying and fluctuation of public sentiment. The nominations bring every man to a close consideration of the real issues. The nomination meetings, the letters of acceptance, the conspicuous changes from side to side, with the tremendous spouting of the party papers, seem to reveal that the current is setting strongly this way or that. But in the end, when the public opinion is felt to be finally settling. In 1864 the month of August was peculiarly gloomy for the Union party. Forts fell, and eminent Union leaders who almost despaired. The Democrats, feeling and seeing this, on the first of September met at Chicago and clamored for surrender to the rebels. But in the October election, about the middle of the month, showed how steady was the popular heart, and very soon afterward the result was a foregone conclusion.

At the present time the result would be beyond doubt if the election were to be an honest vote. But there are many serious elements, the situation in the Southern States and in the city of New York. The Democratic party has organized in the South the coercion of Union voters by starvation and terror. There is no militia in those States for the defense of loyal men, and, as every advantage is with those who intend to defeat the legal expression of the popular will, there is reason to fear that they may succeed. Except for this system of terror, which Congress should have foreseen and avoided as far as possible, most of the Southern States would vote for GRANT.

It is further the intention of the Democratic party to cast such a vote in the city of New York that that of the State may be overcome, as in 1862, when HORATIO SEYMOUR was elected Governor by the city vote. The naturalization machinery for manufacturing votes is in the hands of the Democratic party, and the material already discovered. The managers will make an unusually desperate effort, in the hope of saving the State for HOFFMAN, even if they can not for SEYMOUR. For a defeat in the State as well as in the country would be the severest blow the Democratic party has received. Tammany Hall, meanwhile, has conquered the rival factions. FERNANDO WOOD and MICHAEL CONNOLLY return to the Wigwam. The Honorable JOHN MORRISSEY could do nothing against the Honorable WILLIAM M. TWEED, at Albany; and, whatever the secret jealousies, the party will put forth its strength, conscious that defeat is destruction.

By the electoral vote of New York and of the Southern States the Democrats hope either to carry the election or to remain a formidable and menacing opposition. Yet the alliance upon which they rely is not the old one. Formerly it was the combination of Southern slavery and Northern ignorance and meanness; now it is that of the same ignorance and prejudice with the remnants of the old war power. It talks about peaceful reunion, and draws the sword. It preaches fraternity and good-will, and proposes to trample more than half the population of some States under foot. Vermont sees this. Maine, next week, will show that she sees it. Let New York also see it, and guard against it. The old sectional and Democratic alliance is fraud, and fraud can be circumvented only by the most thorough organization. It is in the city of New York that the huge majority, composed of the most ignorant class in the country, and in the Southern States, by a terrorism imposed by the rebel class, that the Democrats hope to elect HORATIO SEYMOUR. They are organized, perfectly. It is not enough to have the votes; we must bring them out, and watch the enemy.

WHAT CAUSES ANARCHY?

IN 1865 President JOHNSON said to Mr. FREDERICK DOUGLASS that if the freedmen in the Southern States were allowed to vote there would be a war of races. Mr. DOUGLASS replied, "Who will begin it?" Upon which his Excellency the President of the United States sagaciously held his tongue. "The march of the human mind," says BURKE, "is slow. Sir, it was not until after two hundred years discovered that by an errour of Providence had decreed vexation to violence, and poverty to repine. Your ancestors did, however, at length open their eyes to the ill husbandry of injustice."

Who have always been the injured class in the Southern States, and who have always been the aggressors? When those who held more than a third of the population in slavery went to war to make their power hopeless than ever, the oppressed population conducted themselves with unprecedented moderation and humanity. Every possible infamy had been practiced upon them; but when the perpetrators were most exposed the slaves forbore. They were not deceived. They understood the war. They warmly beat with sympathy for those whose victory was their liberty. The victory came and left them free without a crime.

What was the conduct of the master class, defeated in their attempt to perpetuate slavery, and surrounded by a new class of free citizens? It instantly sought to degrade them into serfs. It enacted Black Codes which established all of slavery but the name. It refused to sell land, so that no freedman could acquire a farm, and became of necessity a vagrant; and then the master class made vagrancy a crime, for which a man could be sold to labor. It denied the freedmen arms and the right of sitting upon juries. In every Southern master class showed its malevolence, and treated the colored man a thousandfold worse than Christendom ever treated the Jew. Still the freedmen as a class, although hardened by slavery and disadvantage, did not retaliate, and the war made upon them in private at last culminated in the massacres of New Orleans and Memphis, in which they were mercilessly slaughtered.

Then the Government interfered, and met the haughty refusal of the conquered rebels to accept the Fourteenth Amendment by giving the colored race the defense of the ballot. Therefore the master class began a coercion, which is now still at work. The freedmen. They voted, and, with other loyal citizens, framed constitutions which established equal rights, and which, as a rule, were of extraordinary generosity toward those who had ravaged them in every way. Under these constitutions the Southern States are organized. And now the master class deliberately declare that the whites alone shall govern, that the black who does not vote for his own disfranchisement shall starve, and that, being of an inferior race, he shall have just such a position as the master class appoints, and no other. And because these free citizens of the United States naturally ask to be enabled to defend their rights, and because in some cases there are local outbreaks, naturally springing from such a situation, the papers that called the murderous and appalling New York riots "an uprising of the people" now exclaim that anarchy impends in the Southern States.

Very well, if it does who are responsible? Those who lawfully and quietly exercise the rights conferred by the people of the United States, or those who propose forcibly to prevent them? Is there a single event in the history of the freedmen which shows that they are likely to resort to forcible assaults upon the lawful rights of the master class? Is there a single event in the history of that class or a single trait in its character which shows that it would hesitate in any outrage upon the freedmen? If anarchy is now impending in the Southern States it is due to the spirit and conduct of those who caused rebellion to be impending there eight years ago. It is not the friends but the foes of justice and equal rights who are the authors of anarchy any where in this republic.

THE TAMMANY CANDIDATE.

THE State Democratic Convention at Tweddle Hall, in Albany, was not a wholly happy family. Tammany Hall, as was expected, nominated its candidate; but Tammany Will was portrayed by Mr. S. D. MORRIS, of the Brooklyn delegation, in a series of vigorous touches that were more true than flattering. Mr. MURPHY was defeated by the New York ring; but he was avenged by Mr. MORRIS. Revenge, however, is all that he will receive. It is men like those who compose the Tammany ring who control the Democratic party. They are glad to use the abilities and the character of gentlemen like Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR, but they will not promote them unless those gentlemen will become their tools. In vain Mr. MURPHY, in the Constitutional Convention, argued for "the natural inferiority" of the negro race; in vain, in the State Senate, he has been a faithful party leader; in vain, in the National Convention, as chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, he pledged himself to WADE HAMPTON to support the "revolutionary and void" clause to the end; in vain he had the momentary distinction of reporting the platform; in vain the Saratoga campaign; in vain the fraternization of the Honorable JOHN MORRISSEY. Mr. MURPHY, one of the most conspicuous, capable, and consistent men of his party, was not agreeable to the Tammany Ring, and is not their candidate for Governor, and will not be their candidate for Governor.

"The clique that controls Tammany," exclaimed Mr. MORRIS in the Convention, "seek only their own aggrandizement, and care nothing for the honor, or even for the Democratic party, further than it will contribute to their selfish ends. They have made up their minds to control the entire power and patronage of the State, and if Seymour is elected they hope to grasp that of the whole United States—and what then? Democratic speakers now declare that the masses want the corruption and extravagance of the Republicans, and it is a strong point; but suppose the Tammany clique, with its unfinished Court-house and its thousand other schemes of peculation and plunder, controlled the political power of the State and nation—with what face could any honest man talk about corruption in the Democratic party?" Mr. MORRIS warned the people of the interior of the State "to beware how they helped to extend the sway of that corrupt oligarchy: for they were aware of it they would be quelled up. If fair play could not do it, trickery would."

This is a Democratic portrait of the Tammany Ring, which has just nominated in the Convention one of its most active members, Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, for Governor. The Democratic party of New York was formerly controlled by the Albany Regency, of which MARTIN VAN BUREN, WILLIAM L. MARCY, and AZARIAH C. FLAGG were the chiefs. It is now regulated by the Tammany Ring, of which WILLIAM M. TWEED, PETER B. SWEENEY, and JOHN T. HOFFMAN are managers. If the people of the State are anxious to extend the operations of the Ring they will vote for Mr. HOFFMAN. If they wish a State government wholly independent of cliques and in harmony with the National Administration, they will vote for JOHN A. GRISWOLD.

WHAT GENERAL LONGSTREET SAYS.

DURING the war there was no more resolute soldier of the rebellion than General LONGSTREET. When the rebellion was defeated he honestly accepted the decision that he had invoked, and relinquished all further expectation or design of saving a "lost cause." For that reason he has had no quarter from the Democratic leaders; while Wade HAMPTON, apparently one of the most persistent rebel chiefs, who declares that he yet expects to see the cause triumph, is one of the most eminent Democratic managers. The acceptance of the situation in good faith is something which Democracy can not pardon to a late rebel. It reserves its acclamation for the man who comes into the Convention and says, "Now, gentlemen, we expect you to win what we lost."

In March, 1867, General LONGSTREET wrote a letter in which he advised the late rebels "to accept the terms that are now offered us by the conquerors.....We made an honest and I hope I may say a creditable fight, but we have lost .....Let us come forward, then, and accept the ends involved in the struggle.....Our people earnestly desire that the constitutional government shall be re-established; and the only means to accomplish this is to comply with the requirements of the recent congressional legislation.——Let us accept the terms as we are in duty bound to do, and if there is a lack of good faith let it be upon others." If any Democratic orator has made so sensible a speech as that we have not seen it.

General LONGSTREET now says that he has had no trouble with the freedmen as laborers; that the jury question can be easily enough settled if "a district judge will do his whole duty;" and that the whites of the South know that the talk about "negro supremacy" is gammon. Upon these points General LONGSTREET is quite as good an authority as ROBERT TOOMBS, or HOWELL COBB, or HORATIO SEYMOUR, or ISAIAH RYNDERS.

The General further says that in his opinion the election of SEYMOUR "will re-open all the old issues, and we shall have trouble." General LONGSTREET has evidently read General BLAIR'S letter and the resolutions of the Democratic Convention, and he has observed that the spirit of HAMPTON and BLAIR absolutely rules the Democratic party. He therefore says that "GRANT is my man."

So says General LONGSTREET—so says every man who honestly rebelled and who has honestly surrendered.

GENERAL ROSECRANS AND GENERAL LEE.

ONE of the lighter comedies of the canvass is the exchange of letters between General ROSECRANS and the ex-rebel Generals LEE, BEAUREGARD, and others. General LEE, whose whole career has been that as one of the weakest of men, and whose treachery to the Government was not less contemptible than odious, is saluted by General ROSECRANS in these words: "I know you are a representative man in reverence and regard for the Union, the Constitution, and the welfare of the country." The General then asks the representative man to tell him the public opinion of "the South." Conferring with other representative men, like BEAUREGARD, of "beauty and booty" renown, General LEE replies in a series of statements which shows that he is not familiar with the recent history of the Southern States. Indeed, a grosser misrepresentation of familiar public facts has not been made.

But one assertion is peculiarly amusing in view of the expulsion of the Georgia colored members, of Mr. BLAIR, Mr. BOYER, and others of the South Carolina Committee, and of WADE HAMPTON'S scheme of Democratic voting or starvation. It is the remark of General LEE that "the idea that the Southern people are hostile to the negroes and would oppress them if it were in their power to do so is entirely unfounded. They have grown up in our midst, and we have been accustomed from childhood to look upon them with kindness." The pallid, the auction-block, and the blood-hound were the substitutes for kindness before the war; the Black Codes and the massacres, since.

This letter of General LEE is put forth as a Democratic campaign document, and it is one of the feeblest conceivable.

WEST POINT.

IN our notice, published in May last, of the "Biographical Register of the Officers and Graduates of the United States Military Academy at West Point," by Major-General GEORGE W. CULLUM, who had been connected with the Institution as Graduate, Instructor, Engineer, and Superintendent—we referred to the efforts of Mr. CALHOUN, as Secretary of War under President MONROE, as being the commencement of that active and improved policy which, in connection with the services of General THAYER, has so long and so elevated the Institution into the condition necessary for imparting the highest skill. The publication of a second edition of General CULLUM'S able work upon the plan of D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway, containing many critical notices of it, induces us to recur to the subject. The book possesses a very deep interest to all the graduates of the Institution, and we may well be proud of the eminence which their history bestows upon West Point. To all libraries it will constitute an important addition, as it presents the main incidents in the lives of over two thousand graduates, some of them dating back to almost an immortal renown. The war through which the country has just passed has this among the advantages which it can set off against some of its evils, that it has established West Point upon a secure footing—a result which may be largely traced to the powerful influence of General THAYER, who, released from the duties of his profession as a soldier, lives, at the advanced age of about eighty-three years, in Massachusetts, devoting himself as earnestly to the benefit of his country as he did in the flower of his manhood. When he was impressing upon West Point the character for which it is esteemed.

Major THAYER assumed the duties of Superintendent in July, 1817, a few months after the inauguration of Mr. MONROE, and held the position until July, 1833, only about twenty-seven years in advance of the rebellion. To his great military knowledge, acquired as a student at West Point; by active service in the war of 1812, and in visiting the military establishments of Europe after the European war; to his adhesion to the most perfect discipline; and to his firmness, precision, and unequaled capacity as a Superintendent, are due the great excellence which the Institution reached and still retains. The Administration of Mr. MONROE also blest him with a confidence and support in Mr. CALHOUN, who had a great talent for administration, established the rules which, with a little enlargement, now govern the Military Academy. In 1819, he informed Major THAYER "that it is the determination of the Department to aid in elevating the system of discipline, and to create a system of emulation among the cadets;" and adds, "that in future wars the nation must look to the Academy for the skill to conduct valor to victory."

The officers of the army who have graduated from West Point, when placed in positions in which the expenditure of public funds has been required, have almost invariably proved that the influence of West Point has made them "faithful where few are faithful found." If no other service had been rendered by the Institution, this alone would have been a most important expense for the outlay. This effect may be traced to a system of instruction which looks not to the advantage of the individual so much as the safety and honor of the nation. The desire for wealth scarcely enters into the objects of those who are prepared for a life of public duty, with intellectual skill, and with a conscience which the purest and highest principles of honor. The great soldier who has been named for the Presidency by the Republican party has proved in his life how powerful is the influence of that education. He will have this among other noble recommendations, that the public funds will be safe during his term, and that the spirit of honor and patriotism which West Point inculcates will be stamped upon his administration of affairs.

The experience of the war just over proved satisfactorily that, in addition to the education which West Point supplies, it is necessary to have schools of application and practice. The science officers, when they leave the West Point ends, enter the artillery and the engineer service. Schools of this description to a limited extent have been used by nations of Europe. If we perceive that a tract of land of about three hundred acres adjoining our possessions at Fortress Monroe has been recently purchased by the General Government, it is not unreasonable to suppose that a school of practice is about to be established at Fortress Monroe, as it is the only place in existence, which is to be extended at Fortress Monroe, be able to enter upon the struggle from the start without the serious mistakes which it is conceded were made at the outset of the late contest.

"I can not refrain from observing," said Mr. CALHOUN, in one of his reports as Secretary of War, "as an incident to the general subject of the education of those who may be charged with the defense of the country, and on whose skill and fidelity so much may depend, that so much depend, that, whatever degree of perfection may be given to the military academy at West Point as an elementary school, yet our military academy is defective in the branches of the art of war must remain imperfect without a school of application and practice. The education of the military academy will be full and complete for officers of infantry; but those who may be promoted into the artillery and the corps of engineers ought to have the means, in a school of application, to obtain the more complete their theoretical knowledge in higher branches of the science connected with their profession, and to apply the knowledge acquired to practice."

Officers of great distinction are divided in all countries on the question, whether the system of instruction at the military establishments should consist more of early and deep scientific study or of early practical application. These differences depend most generally upon the construction of the mind. Those who possess minds of mathematics students who are not completed are exhausted, and they naturally prefer what is practical to what is theoretical. Whereas those who are able to master the intricacies of mathematics, and to dismiss their control over the intellect, as shown by the remark of the gentleman Dr. WEIR, of Scotland, in the forgetfulness of their rules, "They have passed from my memory to my judgment," prove that they possess such a degree of ability as will give abundant practice to enable them to form grand combinations and to act with marvelous rapidity.

In England the ascendency of the Classics is established, while in France more attention, and very great attention, is paid to mathematical studies. At West Point the French system that respect is more followed. The first two years are devoted to the study of it theoretically, and it is more applied in the studies of the third and fourth year. French and Spanish are also taught at our academy. As the employment of a Spanish Professor was not authorized by Congress till 1857, when Mr. CONRAD, of Louisiana, was Secretary of War, we presume it had some connection with the acquisition of Mexican provinces. French is taught because many scientific military works are in that language, and because also it is more universally spoken by educated men of all countries than any other.

The subjects of instruction are few and have a direct application to the object—classical studies or those of general literature not being embraced in what is taught. In England more attention is paid to the advantages of a liberal education, while the instruction at West Point, being more practical, produces an officer less adorned in some respects but more substantial. Upon graduating the class is divided into three sections founded wholly on their respective degrees of excellence. The first of the first section, as a reward for extraordinary merit, are recommended to the Secretary of War for any corps in the army they may select; the second class, for any corps but the engineers; and the last to the infantry and cavalry branches only.

The standing of each officer is ascertained by examining as well the conduct-roll which relates to discipline, behavior, order, and subordination; as also the results of studies in all the departments of instruction. It will thus be seen that a spirit of emulation is duly excited in moral as well as intellectual duties, and the result is an officer who can be trusted in any station, and who is fitted to become an ornament to his country.

"GREAT STATESMANSHIP."

RECENT disclosures have left "the great statesman" in a most ridiculous plight. It will be remembered that in the Democratic Convention Mr. SEYMOUR was constantly declining the nomination, spoke of the false position in which his acceptance would place the party, and declared that his honor forbade him to accept. When, however, after all this, he accepted, those only were surprised who did not know "the great statesman." Those who did know him were very much amused in letters of last autumn declining to be a candidate were sufficient evidence of his hope and design of securing the nomination.

On the 20th of August Colonel WILLIAM BROWN made a speech in Frankfort, Kentucky, in which he asserted that leading Democrats intended the nomination of Mr. CHASE; that a platform agreeable to him was prepared; that Mr. SEYMOUR was one of the warm advocates of the movement, and approved the platform, urged in the Convention to designate the nomination of Mr. CHASE, and wrote a speech with which to second the nomination.

This, of course, produced a contemptuous denial from the World. Upon which Colonel BROWN, ALEXANDER LONG, and HENRY REED return to the charge with names, dates, and challenges of denial, and finally the platform itself, upon which Mr. CHASE was to be nominated, is published. To this detailed and overwhelming declaration the World gasps in the most ludicrous manner that Mr. CHASE had no claims upon the Democratic party. But to the main question, in regard to "the great statesman," it has the prudence to say, That question is thus stated by Mr. HENRY REED, the leading editorial writer in the Cincinnati Enquirer, a prominent Democratic paper:

"The question is, Did Mr. SEYMOUR stands affected, is this: Was he dishonest, or merely weak? Was he conduct the result of treachery or imbecility? That Mr. SEYMOUR was either weak or dishonest, that his conduct owed its origin either to treachery or imbecility, is to us plain as noon-day as to forbid denial. His act was that of a knave or of a fool; and that knave or fool was the author of the platform of no common magnitude. It is not complimentary to Mr. SEYMOUR, when his speeches can only maintain his integrity at the expense of his understanding, and his understanding at the expense of his integrity. It is not fortunate for a party to be committed to a candidate in respect to whose character there is a question which can only be answered by the impeachment of either his intellectual or his moral fitness for the place to which he seeks his election."

Mr. REED defines the nomination of Mr. SEYMOUR by the action of certain Ohio delegates, and of Mr. SAMUEL J. TILDEN, Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD, Mr. PETER B. SWEENY, and Mr. SIDNEY S. BARLOW, of New York—all of whom are noted and ardent friends of political purity and public economy—as a "coup de Jonkinidge."

How beautiful is "great statesmanship!"

THE "CHASE PLATFORM."

THE platform upon which certain Democrats in New York and elsewhere hoped to nominate Mr. CHASE is now published. It is already written, and, although of no practical service, suggests one or two observations.

The platform does not state frankly the application of its principles to the actual situation. It declares for equal rights and exact justice for all men, that slavery ought not to be restored, and that the broadest basis of suffrage is the best. But then it says that this question must be left to the States, without national interference. Very well; but how about the reconstructed States? Is the declaration to be retroactive? Are the present organizations to be overthrown, or are they acknowledged? This is the very issue of the canvass, and the platform intentionally evades it. Mr. CHASE, however, was unequivocally committed upon this point. He had acknowledged to the new voters themselves the right of the national authority, under the circumstances, to enfranchise them. He could not honestly have accepted the platform without distinctly stating this fact.

Then the platform declares for the honest fulfillment of all public obligations, but asserts that creditors have no right to special favor in the interpretation of the laws. Certainly they have not. But this expression need is pointless.

Mr. CHASE has plainly said the Five-Twenties must be redeemed in gold, and not in greenbacks. The Republican platform denounces every form of repudiation, and demands payment according to the spirit as well as the letter. The Democratic platform declares that the letter is quite enough. Which platform we are considering evades the question also.

These are the only important points in the platform, and these are wholly obscure. The present equine contemplation, the demand for economy and reduction of the army and navy, the amusing generality about labor and the laborer, are words merely. The essential difference of this platform from the Democratic is its virtual declaration in favor of universal suffrage. Had it been adopted, the policy of the party in the Southern States must have been the failure for the freedmen. The amazing fact is that any intelligent New York politicians should have supposed that the Democratic party, the bulk of which, as the framers of this platform know, is composed of the late slaveholding rebel class at the South and the most ignorant and prejudiced negro-haters at the North, would have taken for its platform a declaration of equal rights, and for its candidate the most radical abolition statesman. Those who read the letters and resolutions were willing to do this there is no good reason why they should not vote for General GRANT.

A FRENCH FRIEND.

EDWARD LABOULAYE, who thoroughly understood the war, as fully comprehends the present political situation. We are allowed to copy a few sentences from one of his letters to an American friend:

"I saw, without regret, the acquittal of Mr. JOHNSON. The reason for justice shown in his trial has raised Americans in the judgment of the world; and, on the other hand, the acquittal by one majority has condemned Mr. STANTON before the same tribunal. And now the election of a new President to execute the laws of Congress approaches, and we shall not say that all my wishes are for General GRANT. The wisdom and humanity shown by him during the war, his respect for law, his capacity for affairs, prove him wholly worthy to stand among the successors of WASHINGTON. I am sure that he will be, as I will have enduring peace. The South has learned both to honor and to fear him, and his firm Administration will complete the reconstruction of the Union."

We remarked in our last issue that a decided change in the vote of Vermont in the State election of September 1 would be indicative of the result in the coming Presidential election. There was a decided change, and in the right direction. The majority of the Republican ticket in 1867 was 6,000; this year 17,000.

He might have added, without fear of the contradiction which the last part of his sentence is sure to receive, that his experience at Port Donelson and Shiloh proved that he was just the man to avoid defeats like those which General Rosecrans, who has lately been hobnobbing with Mr. Stephens, would have suffered but for the skill in his experience at Chattanooga, where Grant saved Rosecrans from total annihilation after the defeat at Chickamauga.

There was a significant scene in the Nova Scotia Assembly on August 24. Attorney-General Wilkins made a violent speech against the confederation with Canada, in which he declared that if redress is not given before the next session the people will appoint a collector of their own and have the dues paid into the local treasury, and if necessary they will appeal to another nation. Such an uproar ensued at the conclusion of the speech that the Speaker declared the Assembly adjourned. The next day a resolution repealing the ordinance by which Nova Scotia became a part of the Dominion was passed with only two dissenting votes: and the Province is now "out of the Union"—in fact "seceded."

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA.

COLUMBUS, before the war, was one of the most thriving cities in Georgia. The cotton factories that gave very considerable wealth and importance to the place were nearly all destroyed by General WILSON at the time of his raid. This destruction was the occasion of very great suffering to the operatives, the majority of whom were females and of Northern origin.

It is situated on the Chattahoochee, and is handsomely and regularly laid out. The population is over 10,000.

AUGUSTA, GEORGIA.

AUGUSTA, of which we give an illustration on page 596, is a handsomé city of Georgia, located on the Savannah River, 120 miles from its mouth. It has at this time about 15,000 inhabitants, and is rapidly increasing, not only in population but in prosperity and beauty.

MACON, GEORGIA.

THE little city of Macon is one of the most important towns in the State of Georgia, and one of the most picturesque. It is the capital of Bibb County, situated on the west bank of the Ocmulgee River, and at the head of steamboat navigation. It is connected by important railroads with Columbus and Augusta. The surroundings of the city make up one of its most beautiful features. The principal residences of the city are built on a light range of hills lying back from the river, while the business part covers the lower lands or basin on the levee. In 1855 the city was largely interested in the cotton trade, and engaged to considerable extent in manufactures. It has grown up to its dimensions as given since 1822, the year of its settlement, the increase being very rapid for a Southern city. During the late war it was of great importance to the rebels on account of the manufactories located there; and JEFFERSON DAVIS once alluded to it as "one of the chief arsenals and granaries of the Confederacy." A Richmond paper published during the war once called it the "National Armory and Central Laboratory of the Confederate States." The city was captured by General SHERMAN in his march to the sea. It was in an attempt to capture it that General STONEMAN was captured in July, 1864.

THE LAWYER'S STORY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER V.

FEW readers of these pages will remember the old jail of —— County. But in that day it was the wonder of gaping boyhood and adult verdancy for many a mile. I have often stopped before the door of the court-house and looked with interest on the faces of the boys that stood gazing up at the grated windows, and heard with eagerness their whispered remarks to each other on the frowning and gloomy look of the walls and bars. I say with interest and eagerness, for in my boyhood I had looked with just such eyes on the old court-house and jail in my native village. And I well remember my awe and terror when one day my kind friend Mr. R——, one of the leading members of the bar of the State, took me with him into the county court, then sitting for the trial of some petty offenders.

I found Ashmun in a comfortable room, well furnished; and when I entered he was overhauling a pile of books which the deputy-sheriff had brought to him.

"Good-morning, my dear Blackstone. Do you know now, if you had not come at this moment, I might have been in a condition to dispense with your services for the future? I sent Mr. Deputy-Sheriff for some books. He has brought me a supply. Look at them. Wouldn't I have been an accomplished lawyer before I had finished the half of them?"

I laughed as I glanced at the array of authorities which the man had selected to amuse his prisoner, but demanded of my client how he came to be in that position.

"Ask the sheriff. He keeps me here."

"But what is the charge?"

"Murder."

I started—not so much at the answer as at the tone, which I recognized as the index to my client's most furious disposition.

"Murder?" I echoed.

"Ay, murder. They say I killed a wretch that was found dead in the highway near the town."

"And did you?"

"Cool, that, upon my word. Did I? Mr. Sheriff's deputy, do us the favor to place the oak between us. Mr. Blackstone is my adviser, and we must be alone. Wait a moment, Blackstone, till I see if the jailer is out of ear-shot. Did I kill the dog? you asked. Well, then, I did."

The matter looked serious, and I drew a chair toward the fire and sat down, silently eying my companion and awaiting his explanation.

"SO WE MADE AN AFTERNOON OF IT," ETC.

"He was the villain you cleared in —— last month. The story is rather long, but you must hear it all. Take a cigar; I have no pipes, nor wine. The county authorities, it appears, claim a right to control the morals of all their prisoners, even the unconvicted, and I drink nothing but water here. Perhaps it is as well, for my brain is remarkably clear; and if you will listen I think I can now give you the clew to a discovery, and the same history will aid you to advise me as to my present position.

"When I left the court-room in New York I waited at the door to see your client, who I knew would be acquitted with such a witness in his favor as I saw he had. Once on the track of Gordon I determined to follow him like a hound. The crowd that came out of the court-room concealed him from me till the moment he passed me. Your man was near him, and I heard them mutter an appointment for the evening. I followed the man, assured that he was my safest tool to deal with. Something about the man pleased me too. He looked like a bold fellow, and the devil in his eye was just what I liked. I doubted my ability to buy him, and so concluded to cheat him. I had my rough coat on, and following him at fifty paces distance I turned up the legs of my trowsers, browned my face with a piece of bark that I picked up on the sidewalk, pushed my collar under my cravat, and dipped my boots in the first mud-hole I could find. The disguise was not perfect, but well enough for the occasion, and I staggered after my man now more closely than before. His course was direct to a sailors' boarding-house in —— Street, and as he turned to the door-steps I accosted him. He looked at me, but made no reply, and entered the door, while I followed and fell into a chair near the bar, calling for some liquor.

"Just out of prison, penniless, and friendless, I was sure that he had not yet been supplied with money by his employer; and I judged rightly in supposing he would be ready to drink with any one who would pay for it. I poured four glasses of liquor into the large sand-box on the floor, while he poured as many down his throat, and they began now to tell on him. So we made an afternoon of it, and by evening he was as drunk as a fool, and as much of a fool as most drunken men. I got out of him the particulars of his appointment for the evening, and resolved to supply his place in the interview, come what might out of it. He knew he was drunk, and I easily persuaded him to let me do so. The hour was nine. The place in the darkest part of —— Alley, whence they were to go to some room known only to Gordon.

"I went, leaving Thompson asleep in his bed. I again feigned drunkenness, and staggered against Gordon in the alley-way. I had learned enough from Thompson to be able to personate him in the dark, and his voice was easily done. Gordon was deceived. How easily I might have killed him then, and who would have suspected me? But my object was not to kill him. I only wanted to find my child—the child of my lost Eve. So I talked little, refused to go with him, intimated that I had had enough to do with him, had run great risks for little reward, and sundry drunken demands to know what more he wanted brought him to the point. Imagine my horror as his plans began to unfold themselves. I can not explain to you by what process of reasoning I arrived at my knowledge. His explanations were reserved and cautious, but I was not the ignorant sailor he thought he was talking with, and he was not so careful as he would have been had he known I was neither stupid by nature nor drunk at the time.

"Blackstone, listen to me. The scoundrel has planned precisely as I told you the last evening that I saw you. He knows that I have made a will in favor of my wife, as she can be, but he knows where she is. Her will is made; and although she is not yet of age he will conceal that, and no one will be able to dispute her heir. He will kill her next, and the inheritance will be his!"

"Impossible!"

"So you said before. I tell you, Blackstone, I know those things of those two brothers to have conceived which were commonly to damn an archangel, yet which they did boldly. I was not shocked, as you are, when I learned his fiendish plan, or heard him speak of its previous failures. I was cool, calm, apparently drunk when it flashed upon me in all its hideousness, and I unravelled its details with a skill that would have done credit to the most practised lawyer. Yes, I did. He did not dream that I understood him. But as he instructed me in my part I listened and made mental deductions.

"First of all I was to come to this village and find Whitstone, and was to give no clue as to the way by which to find the person to whom this letter is directed. That person found, I was to present the letter, and the next course to be pursued is indicated in the letter."

"Have you read it?"

"Of course not. It is sealed. He told me enough to indicate all. I was to bring some one to the city with me. To meet him at the wharf, Parted, and receive further instructions. So we parted.

"You may imagine that I felt myself very sure of my object now. I returned to my own house, assumed a more perfect disguise, and rejoined Thompson on his sneaking in the morning. I had no difficulty at attempting to buy him, but I gave it up. He seemed ashamed of his drunken frolic, and when I told him that he was sent me to meet his employer he was apparently frightened. I gave him briefly the particulars of the interview, told him I had possession of the letter which was to be delivered in this place, and offered to conduct him on the errand. He seemed to be satisfied, and we left town together and traveled very comfortably till within five miles of this place.

"We had taken a carriage at N——, and I was driving. Thompson had been very quiet for an hour, and I began to fancy there was a look of distrust in his eye. As we entered a piece of woods he suddenly turned to me and said, 'You are no sailor.'

"Why no?'

"'You drive too well. I never saw a sailor hold a rein like that.'

"Show me how you would hold them,' said I, offering them to him.

"So,' said he, furiously grasping them with one hand, and laying the whole of the long lash across the backs of the horses, who sprang like lightning at the stroke. The next instant he turned them into the gutter at the road-side, overthrew the entire establishment, lighted on his feet of course, leaped the lane by the thicket before I could pick myself up out of the heap of brush into which I was thrown. It was a short fight. He was the stronger, I the most agile. He was choking me, and I was pounding his face; a lucky chance offered, and I had a finger in his eye. His grasp relaxed, I was released instantly, and I tripped him into the gutter. He sprang up with a knife in his hand, and I had but one resort. I shot him dead.

"As he fell the knife flew to my feet. I picked it up, and while I was looking at it a vague cloud of horror came along. One of them recognized the dead man as his brother, and it seems he was a favorite with the neighborhood. I was a stranger, ill-looking, and, as was soon found out, disguised. I had a knife and a pistol in my hand. I had the marks of the struggle upon me. I was covered with blood. I had killed the dead man. The horses had run away. It was evident I was a highway-robber; had attacked a peaceful man unarmed; had stopped him on the highway, shot him, and was robbing his body when arrested. It looks mightily like it. My pockets were searched, and I suppose my watch and some other costly trifles, rather out of keeping with my dress, helped them to a conclusion as to my character; and as I refused to give my name, here I am, waiting trial for murder, and committed on a charge of murder."

"Committed?"

"No, I suppose not strictly committed, because not yet examined. But I have been here four days, and by this time Gordon must be impatient. I am glad you are here, for what is to be done must be done quickly. We are near the point of discovery if we are but cautious and swift. I have sent for you because I am a prisoner and helpless."

"Have you seen Whitstone?"

"I have not."

"Send for him."

In ten minutes my old friend Mr. Whitstone entered. He seemed to be as sharp as ever.

"What might you wish of me, Sir?' said he to the supposed sailor.

"Why, you see, Sir, this here charge of murder is a pretty serious one, and I haven't exactly an idee what to do about it. I sent for a city lawyer, and he's here this morning. But he says I must hang. Now I mustn't. You can fix it for me. What I want is to see the person that letter is directed to."

Whitstone started and looked at me. He recognized me immediately, and saw that the matter was serious.

"So you got this out of his pocket after killing him, did you?'

"I got that from the man that wrote it.'

"Who was he?'

"You knows him, of course, Mr. Whitstone. He told us, you see, to come up here and see you, and ask where Jerome Jamison lived, and take and deliver this letter ourselves with our own hands. Now I knows that whomsoever it is that they'll help a poor fellow in trouble for the Captain's sake, and I want to see them.'

"Let me have the letter and I will see you day.'

"Close at hand,' thought I.

"No you don't; I wants to see the person. It's directed to Mr. Jamison. But I know as well as you that it's a woman, and I must see her. She'll take care of me. Besides, if you don't bring her and send the letter to some one in New York as will pay well for it.'

Whitstone was in a quandary. After pulling him with a hook—

"Come, old fellow, it's no use bothering yourself. Gordon's folks must stand by me in trouble or I'll not stand by him. I'm in the market now, and the man that bids first will buy me, and it'll be too late to bid higher when I've struck off. Mr. Blackstone's counsel shall know all I know if I don't helped somehow.'

"I'll be back in an hour,' said Whitstone, abruptly leaving the room.

"You'd better,' said Ashmun, laughing.

I followed Whitstone down the hall, and met a young man whom I had brought with me on his track. Ten minutes afterward they rode out of town, one on foot, the other on horse, and the young man soon brought me intelligence that he had gone to a house in the country some miles off, whose inhabitants, he learned, were two young ladies with a housekeeper and servants. The ladies were boarders. One was named Susan Gray; of the other he could not learn the name. Susan Gray I knew, and I could claim acquaintance with her. Ten minutes after this intelligence was received I was alone, my whole the return of Mr. Whitstone alone. He went into the jail, where he announced that a person would call on Ashmun, and desired him who would communicate with Gordon on his behalf.

Toward evening I rode out to call on Susan Gray. My intention was to know of her her welfare, having become accidentally acquainted with her at the time of her grandfather's death.

She was exceedingly beautiful in the deep mourning she was wearing, and expressed her pleasure at seeing me in the kindest manner that I could not but admire and love her.

It appeared that she was living in a house which belonged to her father, and which he rented as a merchant in England. His name was Jamison. He had been kind to her grandfather, though she had never seen him, since since the old man's death, when he had come to America, bringing his own daughter with him.

At this I began to see the web of our search. Her uncle was, of course, my witness, Joseph Gordon, though how he had succeeded in passing for the uncle of Susan Gray I could not understand. This daughter of his was probably the object of our search, brought most opportunely from England at the very time to fall into our hands.

"Where is your uncle now?'

"He was in town this morning, but has gone into town with Mr. Whitstone. He came up suddenly last week, hearing that his man was killed, and that we had taken his letters and his letters. And Mr. Whitstone's visit seemed to distrub him, for he left word that possibly he might take up to the city with him to-night, and we must be ready to go on short notice."

I did not wait to see Miss Jamison, but on the first opportunity departure set out for a short call, I returned to the village and to the cell of Ashmun, to communicate with him and change our plans of action.

As I entered the jail the deputy-sheriff informed me that Mr. Jamison, a gentleman from the city, had gone in to see the prisoner, and that I was about retiring, when a loud cry within the jail startled both of us, and with a common call and rushed upon the door. The latter was sufficiently opaquily. On the floor lay a stranger, bloody, disfigured, struggling, while Ashmun's knee was on his breast and his grasp on his throat. A bend looked out of his eyes as he tightened his hold, and with a demoniac savage onist slowly recovered himself, and I looked at my client for an explanation before I recognized the face of his victim.

"The wretch! See his accursed countenance! Does he not look like the hound he is? Villain, villain, disgrace to my dead mother, that was my wife—before men and God my wife! Long before any of your abhorred name knew her, or cursed her with hypocritical love, she was married to me. You did not know that? But since it has come to this I tell you it was so. You lied in your throat when you said a little her, when you called me thief. For that I struck you. For that I would have choked your small life out of your vile body had not you been entered."

The other stood trembling and half fainting before him, and at length sank into a chair and begged for a glass of water, in a faint, husky voice. This revived him, and he now seemed to gather courage from our presence.

"You shall suffer for this."

"Shall I? If you utter one other word of that sort I will kill you where you stand."

"Mr. Sheriff, listen to him," said the other, shrinking behind the deputy, and shielding himself from Ashmun's rage. "Listen to him, and remember this. I will go to a magistrate immediately.'

"Ha, ha! a threat that likely to frighten a man in prison and charged with murder!'

"Good, Sir! Thank you for reminding me. I'll hang you. By ——, I'll hang you!" And he walked toward the door.

"Stop," said Ashmun, laying his hand on his shoulder.

Gordon stopped, and fairly shook with terror at that iron hand fell on him.

"Stop, and look at me. In my face, man, not at my buttons. Look in my eyes. So! that is something like. Now mark me. I know you, Joseph Gordon, and your whole life. Let me whisper it in your ear. Look at me, and your will hang if I but name it. Did you ever dream I knew it? Scoundrel, I have every evidence I need. Hear me. Look to yourself, Mr. Gordon; and by Him that made me, unless I know this night where to find Eve, I will speak the word."

It was a curious sight to see the eyes of those two men fixed in eternal hatred each on the other. Gordon's gaze drooped first, and he stepped a pace back hesitatingly, then suddenly drew a pistol, and with a quick aim fell at the breast of Ashmun pointed at Gordon, but not so quick as to prevent the blow that Ashmun leveled at him with his tremendous fist, striking with all the force of desperate rage. The blow sounds now in my ears. It was a dull, crushing, bloody blow. It felled the strong man like a log, dashing his head on the stone floor as he fell the pistol in his grasp was discharged, and the ball passed through Ashmun's breast. He staggered against the wall, where he remained for a moment, and then sank slowly to the floor, and a horrible silence was now where but a moment ago was such a fury of vengeance.

The jailer and myself stood looking at each other, and at the men on the floor. It was a strange scene. The deputy-sheriff had no experience in this sort of thing, and I but little more. I roused him from his fit of terror to help me lift Ashmun, and send for a surgeon without delay. There was a heap of bedding on the floor, out of which I extracted two pallets on which to lay the men. The jailer hastened for surgical aid. He was gone a long time, or it seemed long to me, shut in that dismal cell with two dead bodies. The surgeon had fainted, and the two lay as if they were dead, and I feared that unless some aid should arrive soon they would indeed be dead.

The surgeon at length came: two doctors, frightened at the scene quite out of what little wit and skill they had possessed. Each one readily assented to the propositions of the other, and these were so various and contradictory that I soon found I could not guide them, and must take the responsibility. So I begged the one to look after Mr. Jamison's skull, while I examined with the other the bullet-hole in the breast of Ashmun.

I readily took off his coat and vest by cutting with my pocket-knife, and abstracted their contents, and then putting back his shirt I found an inner vest of silk, and in that a concealed pocket, from which I took a miniature. The skull eye of the surgeon failed to see it as I secured it and placed it in the pocket of another part of the vest. The miniature proved me a face of rare and glorious beauty. It was a face to worship with even just such idolatry as his. I could partake it also in memory. The usual means restored consciousness to Ashmun, but Jamison —or Gordon, as I should call him—remained insensible. At the request of Ashmun, heavy as it was, would not have been fatal; but his fall had cut his head, and apparently produced a fracture of the skull. The surgeon continued, and the physicians had no skill to perform any surgical operation for his relief.

"Has he any friends?" said the doctor. "If he has they should be summoned, for this may prove serious."

I dispatched a messenger for Miss Jamison and Miss Gray, and resumed my sent near Ashmun, who had begun to move, and grow conscious of his weakness and weariness. He explained the circumstance of the miniature to him, and he had been quiet for a while, but now seemed impatient and restless. The groans of night had settled on every thing, and the prison was dismal beyond description. Notwithstanding the pain he was manifest that with the darkness a corresponding gloom was coming over his mind, and he began first to see curious phantoms, and then grew flighty, and then delirious, and at length raved terribly. Many of his fancies were queer, many startling, and some were strange. He was chiefly the victim of old friends, and when they came crowding around him he would laugh and joke and play with them, sometimes using wild song, not always in the same language, nor in two or three languages only. It was strange, marvelous, so much so that the surgeon who had remained, and who had imagined him only a poor devil charged with murder, was astonished, and at length, he hastened to the side of Gordon, who continued insensible. They shrank with horror from Ashmun, for they believed him the unprovoked murderer of their only protector.

As they entered I looked up for a moment at Miss Jamison, thinking sadly that this was the end, and a fitting end, to the strange, mad search which my poor friend has so long pursued. At length I saw Eve Ashmun, the myth of whom I had heard so much. For of course I had no doubt that the tall and queenly-looking girl who looked around for her supposed father was the daughter of his foe.

She was certainly very beautiful. Her hair was black, flowing back from a forehead of surpassing purity. But the eye I did not like. It was blue, beautiful, but bad. Could the Grey have had such an eye? It changed all my ideas of her. But I had only an instant for these thoughts, as she threw back with an expression of horror from Ashmun's bed toward Gordon. I left Ashmun, and turned to aid them in their efforts for Gordon. For a half hour we had exerted ourselves with some success, for consciousness seemed returning, when I turned to look at my friend. He was upright in bed, raving with wild, agonizing eyes across the room. I followed his gaze, and saw Susan Grey standing at the head of Joseph Gordon, her right hand on his forehead, which she bathed, while the glare of the lamp shone on her beautifully formed face. Then, for the first time, I saw its startling resemblance to the miniature; and as the idea flashed across me Jimmy Ashmun exclaimed,

"Eve, Eve, my child! come to me, come hither. Leave him—Eve—Eve;" and he fell back, unconscious, but still shifting up his head feebly he called, "Eve, Eve. Oh, that villain! He has stolen her heart as well as my child, and she does not know me. She has used me nor hear me;" and he was again insensible.

His cry had of course startled the others as well as myself, but they were engrossed by the poor criminal. Only I saw Susan Gray pause, and lift her hand to her head, and gaze a moment at the bed. But she stood back once old memory, some dim, indistinct vision, which fled as quickly again and was gone. For a half hour or so Ashmun was then a wild, anxious consciousness returned.

"Bring her totward me, Blackstone. Tell her I wish to speak to her."

"Miss Gray," said I, in a low voice. "This gentleman is not what you take him for. He is not a sailor. He is a gentleman, a friend to whom you may converse without hesitation. He desires to speak with you."

"Miss Gray!" sent him; there is something familiar in his voice."

"There is, there is. You have heard it before. Sit down beside me, child—my child, my own child. Steady now, my soul. These hours are precious. No, I am not delirious again, Blackstone; no, I am not. Miss Gray, these two words, 'my child,' veil-nigh made me mad with joy. Miss Gray, he called you, I think. Tell me if you remember your mother's name."

"I sometimes think I do. It is so long ago. I am not sure."

"Sure! how could you forget? I could not, if I lived ten centuries of just such years as I have lived. Did you love your mother, child?"

"Oh yes, I loved her, and indeed I can not recall her features, yet there has never been a day of my whole life that I have not thought of her as an angel present. Yes, I loved her."

"And so did I. Oh God! yes, I loved your mother."

"You? What right had you to love her?"

"Hear that, ye dwellers in the unseen world! Eve's daughter asks me what right I had to love Eve's mother! Ha, ha! Blackstone, you would not yet believe me if I dared to tell her! Listen, child. Do you remember any of the scenes of your childhood?"

"Some quite distinctly."

"Do you remember a home under the hill side, with a little cove, having in front of the cottage, trees on the terraces, and a fountain, and a large dog with shaggy hair, and a boat, and two white horses, and a low carriage, and a drive along the beach?"

"Strange! I begin to recollect all that. How can it be?"

"And now again. Do you not remember a morning in June? The sun shining on the bay: a little child, playing in front of the cottage, strays down to the beach, and slips from a rock into the water. The dog rescues her, at the instant that her father and mother rush down the lawn."

"I see it. I remember. The dog was Marco and he was not like a human."

"And again. Do you remember leaving that home? Do you remember a night on the house with a dark night—a boat drifting about? You lay, wrapped in a cloak, on deck. A man lay near you. Now, can you recall any more, in your memory, fires, and bloodshed, or did you sleep through it all?"

"Oh no; I woke; I remember it well now. I have not thought of that in years."

"Tell me what followed."

"I was carried away," cried aloud, and was silent. Joseph hastened till they stifled me. After that my memory is not distinct. I remember wandering a long while through green places. As I grew older my memory grows more clear. I know I was brought here, and I was told that my father had wished me to be sent here, but that died before I came; and so his father took me and brought me up, and I lived with him till he died. You remember that, Mr. Blackstone. But how do you remember all these things, Sir?"

"I! Look at me. Hold the light, Blackstone. Look in my face and tell me if you see aught familiar."

"Nothing."

"Eve! Eve!" he cried, in a wild, mournful, broken voice; and then in a loud, clear tone, that seemed as if it might reach the country on the other side the river, "Eve! Eve!"

Susan Gray again leaned forward, and she cry were familiar.

"Eve!—not you—not you. Dead Eve! my Eve! my own lost darling I am calling now. They say that the words we utter here are heard in heaven. Eve—darling—come back, and tell her who I am! Is she not yours, your child, your last gift to me? I would so love her if she looked but kindly at me. God, let her come back one instant now, and tell her child I am her father!"

"My father!"

"Now, Eve, hear that! What are you doing then you do not break your bonds? Oh, poor, frail child! If I were there, and you here, and you called me thus, I would burst the bands of death, and come back to the earth to answer you. Oh, come to me!"

"Does she answer?" It was the low, husky voice of Ishmael that spoke, and a low laugh followed it that was full of malignity. "Does she answer?"

"Uncle! do you know this man? Is he my father?"

"Joseph Gordon, I have hated you and yours with unutterable hate. But I will forgive you all; I will love you: I will call you friend, brother, any thing; I will make you rich; I will die and give you half I have (the other half is her), if you will but tell that girl the truth, and let her whisper the blessed words of a child's love in my ears to-night!"

"I do begin to believe that you are my father," said Susan Gray, who had been deeply moved by the earnestness of Ishmael.

"The voice of Eve spoke then. Say on," said Ashmun, gazing at her with a look that was piteous in its supplicating anxiety. "Speak, and that I was. Child, child, come close to me—lean down here! Would you know your mother's face? look at me, if you saw her now? Does it haunt you through the long years?"

"I dream of her sometimes; but I have thought those only dreams."

"Blackstone, quick—quick! That picture—quick, lest I die! Look at that! Is it she? You know it? It speaks to you—you see it to me. Thank God for that! My prayer is answered. Eve has come back—my child, my child!"

He did not embrace her, nor did she yet approach him—not yet. She held the picture a moment in her hands, and a glorious glow of light and joy spread over her face as she recognized the image of her dreams, and she knelt down by the side of his pallet and looked her face in the clothes, and sobbed out her thanks to God that she had at length found a father and a mother. And then she rose, and looked in his face, and spoke, slowly, clearly, and distinctly—

"I can not yet understand my own history. Before I can determine whether my duty is to obey you as my father I should know the circumstances of my birth. I wish to know what relation you bore to my mother."

"It is your right. I was her lawful husband."

"Liar!" muttered Gordon.

"No, Joseph Gordon, I am no liar. In those blessed days of youth, of when Eve Gray was my boyhood's idol, my companion and my friend, we were as closely bound together as ever man and wife. Each pleasant morning, I remember it as if it were yesterday, we rode together over these hills, among which I am now lying, and came to a dark but beautiful glen where we were to leave our horses and walk. We sat down on the bank of the river, and as the swift waters flowed toward the sea we wrote on three torn leaves from my tablets our vows of marriage. One page was committed to the water to bear it to the world-washing sea, and one each to be kept. It was childish, but it was solemn. A month after that we parted. Open that miniature. Two of those leaves are there, and with her hair.

"I went and returned after long wandering, and she told me of all your and your brother's cruelty, and how I could see how he wronged her. How he basely struck her, like a dog that he was. The little blood I have left boils with fury and I recall the story she told me of his and your foul treatment of that angel girl, that I would not have had harmed for all the stars of heaven. Then she came to me, friendless as she was, and found rest. Yes, rest. In some drunken brawl, some hideous debauch, some vile scene of riot and wrong, your brother's accursed soul escaped to hell; and Eve was free in man's sight and God's sight to be my wife. She was such before, but we repeated our vows. You may find that record, too, in the proper place. This child, the sole fruit of our union, you stole from me; you, Joseph Gordon, stole from me, and have sought to teach to forget me. Her heart and mine are beating close together at last. Now die, and, if when you stand at the bar of God, before you turn your back forever on the world of light, you see Eve Gray an angel there, tell her that her Eve rests at length in a father's arms."

He laid out his hands, and she accepted his embrace, and pressed her lips to his. As he felt that pressure a thrill passed through his frame, a strange, unearthly smile lit his splendid features, and then he fell back on his couch—dead.

It was the last unclouded ray of reason that lit his soul, and when sensation returned none did not return with it.

My story is nearly ended. The passions of his life had their end in the miserable imbecility of his age. His sins were punished. His life had been one of storm, ending in a long, gloomy twilight, which preceded the night.

He was readily discharged from custody when the circumstances became known; for although the array of proofs remained unchanged, the case was very different when the prisoner ceased to be a poor sailor, and became a man worth a million.

Gordon was removed from the cell, and lingered in a doubtful state for nearly or quite three years, and then died. Miss Jamison, as she was called, the beautiful girl that I had mistaken for Eve Ashmun, was in fact the companion of Gordon in wickedness. She had been allied to him for some years, and was doubtless fully informed of all his plots. She disappeared shortly after the events which I have described.

I continued to be the adviser of Ashmun, or rather of his representatives; for his property was placed in the hands of a commission until Eve's majority, when we arranged so that she had control of it. For many years he used to be seen daily driving down town, and always with Eve by his side. I do not think she ever loved him, though she devoted her life to him. Susan Gray, as head Eve, as he once called her, beckoned to him as she had not before in years, and he uttered a loud cry of joy.

"Eve! dear, dear Eve!" said he; and then, as she was going away, he called out: "Eve, wait for me!"

Eve, the living, heard him call, and she came down to his door and listened, but all was still, and she looked in, but the drapery had not moved, and in the dimly-lighted room she went up to the bed and drew back the curtains. He lay calmly there, and she thought he was sleeping, with peaceful dreams, and so she went away and left him. But he was dead.

A ROMANCE OF CASHMERE.

A EUROPEAN (not an Englishman) residing in the valley, during a dangerous illness was carefully and tenderly nursed by a young slave girl, whom on recovering, for the sake of convenience, Leila Zan. With this young person, who was possessed of very great personal attractions, he fell deeply in love, and finding that his passion was returned, determined to make her his wife. But owing to her not being a free woman he was unable to do so without purchasing her, and to this her owner would not give her consent. In vain were the good offices of the Maharajah solicited, for the man was proprietor appealed to; no entreaties could move, no sum of money (in reason) induce her to relent. On the 1st of October, 1866, during the approaching departure of her lover, attempted (fortunately ineffectually) to commit suicide. It was a luxurious day, the sun's rays—as the approaching chills of winter warned him that he must depart, to remember the fate which awaited his betrothed—death or to forget her. Deterred by the difficulties of the case, an English clergyman, who happened to be staying in the valley, hesitated to perform the marriage ceremony, which itself indeed would hardly have been effectual. In this dilemma, and as a last resource, a stratagem was resorted to which unfortunately succeeded. One fine morning Leila Zan, habited in the usual costume of her people (a long Turkey-red cloth flowing down loosely about the waist by a shawl, and a small skullcap of gold embroidery upon the head), succeeded carelessly into the little garden-orchard which surrounded the house in which she was domiciled. A wedding, of course, occasioned no remark. It was naturally supposed that she had merely gone, according to custom, to while away some of the hot portion of the day beneath the cool shade afforded by the trees, or in the summer-houses interspersed among them, but she was not until after four hour had gone by, and the shades of evening were beginning to fall, that, alarmed by her non-appearance, her companions (some of whom were employés of her proprietor) thought it incumbent on them to go in quest of her. To their surprise, the pleasure-grounds searched in vain—she was nowhere to be found!

Terrified and astonished (the more so as the European had also disappeared), the girls hurried off to the authorities with the news. Great was the indignation at the palace of the Sheriphet when it was received, but they were told to calm themselves; "the lady must be only hiding somewhere; all the passes are strictly guarded, and no native female can possibly evade the scrutiny of the sentinels." Nevertheless, all their efforts to recover her proved ineffectual, and she was never seen again by human mere. Her mode of escape was subsequently ascertained to be this:

A large and swift boat manned by sixteen picked oarsmen had been for some time previously moored day and night by the European's orders in the Jhelum at the bottom of the quince-orchard; relays of ponies had also been provided and stationed at intervals upon the Murree road, leading into British territory. When all was prepared the lovers had met by appointment in a secluded part of the orchard, where the "fair Indie" quickly donned the contents of a bundle which had been brought by her companion, and, being of a very fair complexion and rather tall, made up into an excellent imitation of an English boy or youth, whose costume she had assumed. She and her friend then walked with her companion from out the trees would have guessed her identity from her appearance, for her own dress she, of course, carried off with her, as, if found, it would have told a tale. Once safely on board the boat shot off at its utmost speed, toward Baramoola, where a party of excellent ponies awaited them. They had seventy miles, however, to do before they could reach the English frontier, and the road was steep and difficult. Luckily the telegraph was not invented. The picket of soldiers at the last pass merely stood aghast as two mad Englishmen (as they thought them) galloped past. After a long and a fatiguing ride the fugitives safely crossed the boundary line—the Jhelum River—the lady a free woman. It is pleasant to know, finally, that she really became the wife of her deliverer, and the happy mother of a numerous family.

ANCIENT CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES.

How the world is governed by phrases! Look at that old saying that history never repeats itself. How it lives! Yet it is transparently false. History, like poetry, is, after all, only a reproduction, with slight variations, of a single set of ideas; and those ideas are, for the most part, of Eastern origin. Our religion—what is that? Semitic to the very roots. Our system of jurisprudence? Roman, both in form and spirit. Poetry, the drama; sculpture, painting? An importation from many parts a servile imitation of Greek models. Our system of weights and measures is of Assyrian origin. Our watchfaces are a device of the priests of Baal. Solomon was quite right. There is nothing under the sun. That idea of self-help by co-operation, which finds expression in our trade and friendly societies, is generally thought to be a pure product of Anglo-Saxon thought. Yet even that is second-hand. It is only the reproduction of a Greek idea. Mr. Tomkins, the chief clerk in the office of the English Registrar-General of Friendly Societies, has been puzzling out some mystical inscriptions on the ruined tablets of Greece; and there, written in stone, he finds the history of scores of friendly societies, characterized by all the virtues, and some of the vices, of our own. The object of these Greek societies, like many of this day, was a mitigation of the miseries of life, and the decent burial of their members after death; and their machinery was identical with ours. It was a system of self-help by co-operation. The analogy is closer still; but most of these friendly societies of Greece were a species of trade unions. Wind the subscriptions to the Greek societies were we will not entertain. But Mr. Tomkins has discovered the accounts of a Roman society founded at Lanuvium; and, calculating from analogy, we should say they were very small. The entrance fee to the Lanuvium Society was an amphora or jar of wine, and a hundred sesterces (say $3 50). The contributions were 50 cents a year, or 4 cents a month. The return, of course, was correspondingly small. It was $12 50 for a funeral; and out of that the heirs were required to set apart $1 80 for distribution at the burning of the body. Most of these societies appear to have led a very precarious life. They were generally on the verge of bankruptcy. The contributions were on too low a scale, and even these were kept up by the members with any thing like regularity. The Roman societies had a rule confiscating the contributions of members who did not pay up promptly, and striking their names out of the list. Probably the Greeks had also; but they seem to have been particularly fortunate in the selection of their secretaries and treasurers, for these officers frequently put their hands into their own pockets to eke out the funds of the societies. It is the only striking and suggestive point of difference between American and Greek friendly societies.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THERE is a deal of discussion just now about long Sermons. We cordially complain of the length of a Sermon if a man preaches for eternity!

AGRICULTURAL JOKES.

Large horses are generally most admired by farmers; but farmers are most admired who pony up.

Horses are generally based upon knowledge and industry; the swine will always get more than nose most.

Sheep are like fowls; neither will get fat unless with out industry.

A man who attends a flock of sheep is a shepherd, makes it no reason that a man who keeps cows should be a cowherd.

We like to see a farmer increase the growth of useful plants and shuns the growth of weeds, but do not like to see him make use of rails, poles, and stakes to prop-e-gate with.

The infelicitiness of most recipes is captually illustrated by a rule given by an excellent magazine cook, who was colected for making delicious corn bread. Says Dinah: "Why, darlin', sometimes gen'ally I takes a little meal, and sometimes gen'ally I takes a little flour, an' I takes a little mixin 'em up with some hot water, an' I puts in eggs enough an' a little salt, an' then I bakes it jest bout 'nough. An' you do so, jess so, honey, an' you'll make it as good as I do."

POPULAR CREED.

I begin to believe, nowadays, that money makes the man, and dress the gentleman.

I begin to believe that those who ein the most dazzle the weak are the most devout upon Sundays.

I begin to believe that honesty is the best policy—that is, provided you have gained every body's confidence, then line your pockets.

I begin to believe in encouraging people out of their dollars. It is better than stealing nor begging, and those who are humbugged have themselves to blame.

I begin to think that a man was not made to enjoy possession of riches, but to distribute the surplus and relieve distress.

I begin to believe that the surest remedy for hard times is a tight money market is an extravagant expenditure on the part of the individuals to keep money moving.

I begin to believe that none but knaves are qualified to hold office under the government, with the exception of a few natural born fools and lunatics.

I begin to believe that a piano-forte is more necessary in a family than bread and meat.

A mother, trying to get her little daughter of three years old to sleep one night, said:

"Anna, why don't you try to go to sleep?"

"I am trying," she replied.

"But you haven't shut your eyes."

"Well, can't help it; una comes unbuttoned.

CHARGE OF THE DRESS BRIGADE.

Half a league, half a league, half a league rearward
Right through the mire and dirt,
Down to the beauty's hurt,
Dragged the rich silken skirt,
Half a league rearward.

Half a pack, half a pack, half a pack fully—
Hirsute and woolly,
Right into the liquid air—
Rose up the pile of hair,
From other heads rendered,
Nobly astraddle on it,
Rode the brush headed—
Rode, though it wondered.
Curls to the right of it,
Curls to the left of it,
Curls to the rear of it,
Curls that were plundered.

What though men shout, "Oh, fie!"
"Fortune favors the brave!"
There's not to make reply,
There's not to answer why,
There's but to dress or die—
Dress in the circle they cry.
Charge by the hundred."

HOW WE LOVE THEM.

A woman tells a mighty story
A dry-goods merchant's oath,
We must regard her as a fool
And love her by the yard.
But when we see a pretty maid
Wear gaiters very neat,
Our gaze descends, we're much afraid—
We love her by two feet.
Adoring thus by inch and measure
Affords a most ecstatic pleasure.

"My dear," said a lady to her husband, "these friends here will not believe me when I say I'm only forty years old. You know that I speak the truth, don't you?"

"I certainly shall not deny it, my love, since you have stuck to the point for the last dozen years, in my certain knowledge."

When were eggs first laid in England?—In the time of Hen. I. of course.

OLD LADY. "I wish to purchase a copy of Lord Byron's Works, bound in calf."

SHOPMAN. "Yes, ma'am, will this one suit you?"

SHOPMAN. "They are all the same, I can assure you, ma'am; it's in consequence of the cattle plague."

Old Lady buys the books perfectly satisfied.

"They don't make as good mirrors as they used to," remarked an old lady, as she observed a sunken eye, wrinkled face, and dull complexion in a glass that she usually looked into.

SHARP JOKING.

Says Della to a reverend dean,
"What reason can be given,
Since marriage is a holy theme,
That there are none in heaven?"

"There are no women there," he cried;
She quick returned the jest,
"Women are there, but I'm afraid
They can not find a priest."

THE STOCKBROKER AT DINGLEWOOD.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THOSE who saw Dinglewood only after the improvements had been made could scarcely be able to form to themselves any idea of what it was before the Greshams came. I call them improvements because every body must the same; but I am not sure I thought the house improved, it was an old-fashioned red-brick house, nothing to speak of architecturally. The drawing-room opened its tall, narrow windows upon a little terrace, which was very green and grassy, and pleasant. I should be sorry to undertake to say why it was called Dinglewood. My Coventrys made very merry over the name when he had it. He used to say it was because there were no trees; but that was not strictly the case. It was quite open and bare, it is true, toward the river, which we could not see from the front; but there was a little grove of trees which interposed between us and the house, as if to shut out Dinglewood from the vulgarity of neighbors. It was a popular house in a quiet way when the Coventrys were there. They did not give parties, or pretend to any such trouble in the way of society, for Lady Sarah was always delicate; but when we were tired with our view on the Green, and our lawns and flowers, we were always welcome on the Dinglewood terrace, where the old people were constantly to be found sitting out in the summer afternoons. Lady Sarah on her sofa, and Mr. Coventry with the newspapers and his great dog. The lawn went sloping down toward the river, which lay still and wide, and when the sun shine, with a little green island, and a little gray house making a centre to the picture. A row of the tallest poplars that was known in those days stood on the island, and kept like velvet; but when it became full those autumn days, and Lady Sarah's pet old decrepit stood up to her knees in the cool clover. There was an old mulberry-tree close to the wall of the house, which shaded that sofa; and in gloomy yew on the other side did the same thing for Mr. Coventry, who was an old Indian and a shakuandy, and could bear any amount of sun, shine. Lady Sarah's perpetual occupation was knitting. She knitted all sorts of bright-colored things in the most fantastic open work with big iron pins, and her husband used to read the news to her. They read all the debates together, stopping every now and then to exchange their sentiments. Lady Sarah would say with her brisk little voice, "He might have made a better point there. Don't see this, my dear, upon his case. I don't agree with that;" and Mr. Coventry would stop and lay down the paper on his knees, and discuss it leisurely. There was no reason why they should not do it at their leisure. The best part of the summer days were spent thus by the old couple; and the autumn days, warm and still, and thorn, and the leaves rustled softly, and the cool grass kept growing under their peaceful old feet. These feet had walked this soil so long, and all this has nothing in the world to do with my story. But it was a pretty sight in its way. They were not what the furniture and mutuets were, very faded, and every thing very different from what it came to be afterward; yet we were all very fond of Mr. Coventry and his pretty old wife, and the old-fashioned house was appropriate to them. I like to think of them even now.

We were all anxious, of course, after Mr. Coventry's death, to know who would buy the house (Lady Sarah could not bear it after he was gone, and, indeed, she died in a year after him), and when it was known that young Mr. Gresham was the purchaser it made quite a sensation on the Green. He was the son of old Gresham, who had bought Bishop's Hope, a noble place at Cookeford about a dozen miles off, and had made all his fortune as a stockbroker, and, they say, not even the best kind of that. His son had succeeded him in business, and had highly married somebody in his own class. He was a handsome looking young fellow enough, and had been brought up at home, so he said, like so many of those people's sons; but still one felt that it was bringing in a new element to the Green. If his wife had been one of the county people, a gentleman, it would have made things comparatively easy. But she was only the daughter of a mercantile man himself, and there was great discussion among us as to what we should do when they came. Some families made up their minds at once not to call; others, on the other hand, declared that such rich people were sure to offer the whole county, and that every body would go to them. The latter party had been a real fact it would never have answered; but they are frightfully rich, and, of course, we must all go down on our knees, Letitie Doyle said. She was the most eager of all to know them; for her youth was passing away, and she was not likely to marry, and the Stokes were so poor. I confess I was curious myself to see how things would turn out.

Their first step, however, was one which took us all by surprise. Young Gresham dashed over in his Yankee wagon from Cookesley to go over the house, and the same day a charming barouche made the tour of the Green, with a very pretty young woman in it, and a lovely little girl, and a matchless tiny boy—to—all going to inspect Dinglewood. The grass on the carriage were quartered to the last possibility of quartering, as if they had come through generations of horses and gentlemen of coat-armor, and the footman was powdered and dazzling to behold. Altogether it was by far the finest equipage that had been seen in these parts for a long time. Not to speak of Lady Denzil's, or the other great people about, her Majesty's own carriage, that she drives about the neighborhood in, was not to be compared to it. Its emblazoned panels brushed against the privet hedges in poor old Lady Sarah's drive, which was only wide enough for her little pony-carriage, and I have no doubt were scratched and spoiled; but the next time we heard about Dinglewood we had a flood of workmen had come down upon it, and that every thing was to be changed. Young Mrs. Gresham liked the situation, but the house was far too small for her. My maid told me a new dining-room and drawing-room, with bedrooms over them to be added, and already the people had set to work. We all looked on thunder-struck while these "improvements" were going on: he had a right to do it, no doubt, as he had bought it; but still it did seem a great piece of presumption. The pretty terrace was cut off, and the poor old mulberry-tree perished in the changes, though it is true that they had the sense not to spoil the view. They added two wings to the old house, with one sumptuous room in each. Poor Lady Sarah's drawing-room, which was good enough for her, these men pulled down to make a billiard-room, and put them all en suite, making a passage thus between their two wings. I don't deny, as I have already said, that they had the good right to do it; but all the same it was very odd to us.

And then heaps of new furniture came down from town; the wagons that brought it made quite a procession along the road. All this produced and display had a bad effect upon the neighborhood. It really looked as if these new people were already crowing over us, whose carpets and hangings we had thought were in such good fashion. There was a general movement of indignation on the Green. All this expense might be well enough for them, who were going to live in a town-house, people said, but in the country it was vulgar and stupid. Every thing was gilded and ornamented and upholstered in the new Dinglewood: Turkey carpets all over the house, and rich silk curtains and immense mirrors. Then came a while "in the family" (which I know was with such a flutter of fine carriages as had never been seen before among us. The drive had been widened, down which Lady Sarah's old gray used to jog so comfortably, and there was nothing in its powder. We were too much excited about it at first when these vehicles passed; but custom does a great deal, and one's feelings soften in spite of one's self. I am bound to say, in old Green, Lottie Stoke was the one who did most for the new people. "I mean to make mamma call," she said; "and she will make a round of visits for the purpose of saying it. "Why shouldn't we all call on them? I think it is mean to object to people for being rich, if they are as if we were ashamed of being poor; and they are sure to have quantities of people from town, and to enjoy themselves as much as we are, Mrs. Mulgrave: they are not so particular in London."

"My dear Lottie," said I, "I ave no doubt the Greshams themselves are quite as good as we are. That is not the question. There are social differences, you know."

"Oh yes! I know," cried Lottie; "I have heard of them all my life, but I don't see what the better we are for all our sicety; and I mean to make mamma call."

She was not to good as her word, however, for Mrs. Stoke was a very determined woman, and to see what other people would do. And in the mean time the Greshams themselves, independent of their wealth, were very pleasant people, presented themselves, as it were, before us for approval. They walked to church on Sunday without any display, and were quite as attentive in their favor; and she was very pretty and sweet-looking, and he was so like a gentleman that you could never tell the difference. And the end of it all was, that one fine morning Lady Denzil, without saying a word to any one, called; and then every body in the Green.

I do not pretend to say that there was not a little air of newness about these young people. They were like their house, a little too bright, too costly, too luxurious. Mrs. Gresham gave herself over to them pretty little airs of wealth, which, to do her justice, seemed to be the way of kindness to others than display for herself. There was a little too much confidence about her which made one smile, and yet made one feel at ease, and not just a little angry. It might not have mattered if she had been a princess, as I did not answer with a stockbroker's wife. She was so anxious to supply you with any thing or every thing you wanted, that it made you feel as if you say in a lavish way, whenever there was any shortcoming, and opened her pretty mouth and stared with a little air of surprise, if your wishes were declined. She wanted that delicate sense of other people's pride, which a true great lady always has, she did not understand why one would rather have one's own homely maid to wait, than borrow her powdered slave; and would rather walk than be driven in her own carriage. This bewildered her, poor little woman. She thought it was unkind of me in particular. "You can't really prefer to drive a shabby fly, dear, in your little low carriage," she said, with a curious want of perception that my pony carriage was my own. This was the only defect I found in her, and it was a failing which leaned to virtue's side. Her husband was more a man of the world, but he too had money written all over him. They were dreadfully rich, and even in their freest moment they could not get rid of it—and they were young and open-hearted, and anxious to make every body happy. They had people down from town as Lottie prophesied—fashionable people sometimes, and clever people, and rich people. We met all kinds of radicals, and artists, and authors, and theatre travelers at Dinglewood. The Greshams were rather proud of their literary acquaintances, indeed, which was surprising to us. I have seen old Mr Gresham look very queer when he was told he was going to meet So-and-So, who had written some famous book. "Who is the fellow?" he said, privately, to me, with a comical look, for he was not very literary in his tastes—neither were the Greshams for that matter—but then, having no real rank, they appreciated a little distinction, howsoever it came; whereas the second cousin of any poor lord or good old decayed family was more to the most of us than Shakspeare himself or Raphael; though of course it would have been our duty to entertain or to get off to dinner any queer gentlemen had we met them at dinner, any where on the Green.

But there was no doubt that this new lively household, all astir with new interests, new faces, talk and movement, and pleasant extravagance, did wake us all up. They were so rich that they took the lead in many things, in spite of all that could be done to the contrary. None of us could afford to many things. The Greshams had always something on hand. Instead of our old routine of dinners and croquet-parties and perhaps two or three times a year for the young people, there was an endless variety now at Dinglewood; and even if we elders could have resisted Mrs. Gresham's pretty winning ways on our account, it would have been wicked to neglect the advantage for our children. Of course we had to keep up with it, and have no children; but I was never disposed to stand very much on my dignity, and I liked the young couple. They were so fond of each other, and so good-humored, and so happy, and so ready—too ready—to share their advantages with every body. Mrs. Gresham sent me her last new bonnet (I know how much Champagne the morning of the day when they were all coming to play croquet on my little lawn, with his pretty wife, and I have no doubt there's a love, whether he should come to help, or whether he was any thing else he wanted. I had entertained my friends in my quiet way before she was born, and I did not like it. Lottie Stoke thought it was a fine thing to be the message arrived, and took up the reasonable view, as she had got into the way of doing where the Greshams were concerned.

"Why should not they send you Champagne?" she said. "They are as rich as Cœsus, though I am sure I don't know much about him; and you are a lady living by yourself, and can't be expected to think of all these things."

"My dear Lottie," said I, "I confess I was angry—" if you are not content with what I can give you, you need not come to me. The Greshams are very welcome to Champagne in the afternoon when you are playing croquet: It is just like those nouveaux riches. They would do well to send it to the poor, that, if they could drink pearls like Cleopatra. Champagne!"

"They must have meant it for cup, you know," said Lottie, all unmoved.

"I don't care what they meant it for," said I.

"You shall have cups of tea; and I am very angry with Gresham. I wonder how they think we got on before they came!"

And then I sat down and wrote a little note, which I fear was rather severe, and sent a tub of the baskets back with John Thomas, while Lottie went and looked at all the pictures as if she had never seen them before, and humored the fairies under her breath. She had taken up these Greshams in the most curious way. Not that she was at all a romantic person; she could see their fruits like the rest of us, but she was always ready to make excuses for them. "They don't know any better; they would say softly when she was driven to the very extremity of her special pleading. And she said this when I had finished my letter, and was sending it away.

"But why don't they know better?" said I; "they have had the same education as other people. And I don't see where a boy should learn how to behave himself, even if he does not learn any thing else. And she went to one of the fashionable schools—as good a school as any of you ever went to."

"We were never at any school at all," said Lottie, with a sigh. "I wish we had, for much too poor. We have never learned any thing, we poor girls; whereas Ada Gresham has learned every thing," she added, with a little laugh.

It was quite true. Poor Mrs. Gresham was overflowing with accomplishments. There was er was such an education as she had received. She had gone to lectures, and studied thorough bass, and knew all about chemistry, and could sympathize with her husband, as the newspapers say, and enter into all his pursuits. How fine it must be to know every thing! Though I was angry, I could not but laugh too—a young woman wanting ed an elaborate education indeed to be fit to be young Gresham's education!

"Well," I said, "after all I don't suppose she means to be idle and uninformed, Lottie, and I like her. I don't think her education has done her much harm. Nobody could teach her to understand other people's feelings; and to be rich like that must be a temptation."

"I should like to have such a temptation," said Lottie, with a sudden sparkle in her eyes. "Fancy! there are four Greshams, and they are all as rich. The girl is married, you know, to a railway man; and, by-the-by," she went on, suddenly, after a pause, "they tell me one of the brothers is coming here to-day."

She said this in an accidental sort of way, but I could see there was nothing accidental about it. She drew her breath hard, poor girl, and a little feverish color got up in her cheeks. It is common to talk of girls looking out for husbands, and even hunting that important quarry. But when now and then in desperate cases such a thing does actually come before one's eyes, it is any thing but an amusing sight. The Stokes were as poor as the Greshams were rich. Lovered had ruined himself, and half killed every body belonging to him only the year before; and now poor Lottie saw a terrible chance before her, and rose to it with a kind of tragic valor. I read her whole meaning and resolution in her face, as she said, with an attempt at a smile, those simple-sounding words; and an absolute pang of pity went through me. Poor Lottie!—it was a chance for her family and for herself—even for poor Everard, whom they all clung to, though he had gone to Australia. What a change it would make in their situation and prospects, and every thing about them! You may say it was an ignoble foundation to build family comfort upon. I do not defend it in any way; but when I saw what Lottie meant, my heart failed for her. It did not seem to me ridiculous or base, but tragic and terrible; though to be sure in all likelihood there is nobody who will think so but me.

Before Lottie left me, Mrs. Gresham came rushing over, in her pretty summer dress, with her curls and ribbons fluttering in the breeze. She came to ask me why I had been so unkind, and to plead and remonstrate. "We have so much, we don't know what to do with it," she said; "Harry is always finding out some new vintage or other, and the cellars are overflowing. Why would you not use some of it? I think we have much of every thing we don't know what to do."

"I would rather not, thanks," I said, feeling myself flush, "but I am a lovely day it is."

"It is because you are so shin," said Mrs. Gresham; "I never feel the cold for my part; but I shall not drive at all to-day—I forgot—I shall go and fetch Harry from the station, and come to you. Mrs. Mulgrave will send out tea. Mr. Mulgrave, about the Champagne?"

"It is a little too early for the heath," said Lottie, steadily, looking our visitor in the face. "It is always cold there. What they call bracing, you know; but I don't care about being braced, the wind goes through and through one, even on a sunny day."

"It is because you are so thin," said Mrs. Gresham; "I never feel the cold for my part; but I shall not drive at all to-day—I forgot—I shall go and fetch Harry from the station, and come to you. Mrs. Mulgrave will send out tea. Mr. Mulgrave, about the Champagne?"

"My dear, I am going to give you some tea," said I, "and my maids can manage beautifully; the sight of a gorgeous creature like John Thomas distresses them; they can't attend to their cares at his plush and his powder. We shall be very glad to have Mr. Gresham and you."

"But—but—" began, eagerly. Then she caught Lottie's eye, who had made some sign to her, and stopped short, staring at me with her blue eyes. She could not make it out, and I could not mind, there was nothing to prevent him; but he got into a fashionable set first, and then he got married to Ada. He is a good deal older than Ada Gresham, you know. He is quite beautifully—Harry always consults Gerald before buying any thing, and I don't know what he does with all his money, for he keeps up no establishment, and no horses nor any thing. I tell him sometimes he has no money, but I am sure Harry should reason to say so, for he gives me beautiful presents. I should so like to bring him here."

"You will bring them all presently," said I; but I could not help giving a little sigh as I looked at Lottie, who was listening eagerly. When she saw me look at her, her face flushed scarlet, and she went in great haste to the window to hide it from Mrs. Gresham. She saw I had found her out, and did not know what to make of it was in my heart. She gave a wistful glance up into my face as she went away. "I don't despise me!" it said. "Forgive! if it ever came to be useful to do evil that good might come!" They went away together, the poor girl and the rich happy young wife. Lottie was a little the elder of the two, and yet she was not old, and they were both pretty young women. They laid their heads together and talked earnestly as girls do, as they went out of my gate, and nobody could have dreamed that their light feet were entangled in any web of tragedy. The sight of the two who were so unlike, and the thought of the future which might be in store for them, made me somehow more melancholy, I could not have told why.

CHAPTER II.

WE did not miss the Champagne-cup that afternoon, though it is the general approve of such beverages for young people, and the connection any thing but tea before dinner. The Dinglewood people were doing their best to introduce those foolish extravagances among us, but I for one would not give in.

Young Gresham, though he took some tea, drew his wife aside the moment after, and I heard him question her.

"It was not my fault, Harry," she cried, not knowing I was so near. "She sent it all back, and Lottie said I had hurt her feelings. I did not know what to do. She would not even have John Thomas to wait."

"Nonsense!" said Harry Gresham; "you should have insisted. We ought not to let her go to any expense so. I don't suppose she has a shilling more than she wants for her own affairs."

"But I could not help it," said his wife.

I don't know what the bank-note had said to her, but she was evidently a little frightened. As for Harry, I think he would have liked to leave a bank-note for me on one of the tables. People have told me since that it was a very bad sign, and that it is only when people are getting reckless about money that they think of throwing it away in presents; but I can not say I have had much experience of that weakness. The new brother who had come with them was a very different kind of man. I can not say I took to him at first. He was not a wealthy, simple-minded, lavish creature like his brother. He was more like other people. Harry Gresham was red and fair, like a girl, inclining to be stout, though he was not above thirty, and had the manners which are, or were, supposed to be especially English—downright and straightforward. Gerald was a few years older, a little taller, browned with the sun, and bearing the indescribable look of a man who has much much with the world. I looked at Lottie Stoke when I made my first observations upon the stranger, and saw that she too was looking at him with a strange expression, half of repugnance, half of wistfulness in her eyes. Lottie had not done her duty in the way of marrying, as we ought to have done, in her early youth. She had refused very good offers, as her mother was too apt to tell with a little bitterness. And by the time when things were going so badly with the family, she had made up her mind to try; but when she did so she found a second Harry Gresham, and not this man of the world. She looked at him as a mystery might look, standing on the edge of a precipice, gathering up her strength for the plunge, shrinking yet daring every thing. My party was quite dull for the first hour because of this general Lottie Castle made on the look, for she was always the soul of every thing. When I saw her all at once rise up from the chair where she had been sitting distinguished beside Mr. Beresford, and go up to Mrs. Gresham, who was standing aside with her brother-in-law looking on, I knew that she had made up her mind at last, and taken the plunge. An experienced rich young man of the nineteenth century! I thought to myself that she might spare me that.

Just at that moment I saw the gorgeous figure of John Thomas appear at the end of my lawn, and a sudden flash of anger came over me. I got up to see what he wanted, thinking they had sent him back again notwithstanding my refusal. But just before I reached him I perceived that his errand was to his master, to whom he gave a telegram. Mr. Gresham tore it open at my side. He ran his eye over the message, and uttered something between his teeth and grew red all over in indignation or trouble. Then, seeing me, he turned round, with an effort, with one of his broad smiles.

"Business even in the midst of pleasure," he said. "Is it not too bad?"

"If it is only business—" said I. Whenever I see one of those telegraph papers it gives me a heart beat. I always think somebody is ill or dead.

"Only business, by Jove!" said Harry. His voice was quite subdued, but he laughed—a laugh which sounded strange and not very natural. Then he gave himself a sort of shake, and thrust the thing into his pocket, and offered me his arm, to lead me back to my place. "Bythe-by," he said, "I am really to quarrel with you, Mrs. Aldgrave. When we are so near, why don't you let us be of some use to you? It would be the greatest pleasure both to Ada and me."

"Oh, thanks; but indeed I don't want any help," I cried, abruptly coming to a sudden stop before Lady Ann's chair.

"You are so proud," he said, with a smile, and so left me to plunge into the midst of the game, where I was soon clamoring for Ace. He played all the rest of the afternoon, entering into every thing with the greatest spirit, and I could felt a little disturbed. Whether it was for Lottie, or whether it was for Harry Gresham I could not well explain to myself; a feeling came over me like the breath with which one sometimes wakes in the morning without any reason for it—an uneasy restless sense that something somehow was going wrong.

The Greshams were the last of my party to go away, and I went to the gate with them, as I had a way of doing, and lingered there for a few minutes in the slanting evening light. It was nearly seven o'clock, but they did not dine till eight and were in no hurry. She wore a very pretty dress—one of those soft pale grays which soil if you look hard at them—and had gathered the long train over her arm like a figure in a picture; for though she was not very refined, Ada Gresham was not a vulgar woman to wear her dress over a dusty road. She had taken her husband's arm as they went along the sandy brown pathway, and stood on the other side from me, her parasol and leaned toward her to talk. As I looked at them I could not but think of the strange difference of life: how many years have to get through the world by themselves as best they may, and some have care, and love, and protection on every side of them. Surely two would have kept the very wind from blowing upon Ada; they were ready to shield her from every pain, to carry her in their arms over any thorns that might come in her way. The sunshine slanted sideways upon them as they went along, throwing fantastic broken shadows of the three figures on the hedgerow, and shining right into my eyes. I think I can see her now leaning on her husband's arm, looking up to his brother, with the pretty sweep of the gray silk over her arm, the white embroidered skirts beneath, and the soft rose-ribbons that caught the light. Poor Ada! I have other pictures of her, besides this one, in my memory.

Next day we had a little discussion upon the new brother, in the after-noon when my visitors looked in upon me. We did not mention ourselves to that one subject. We diverged, for instance, to Mrs. Gresham's toilet, which was so pretty. Lottie Stoke had got a new bonnet for the occasion; but she had not turn my head that way and looked too. The whole house had the effect being lighted up for an illumination. It always had a revealed smell, in different rooms, and even the use of its different rooms to all the world by its lights. The Greshams were the kind of people who have every new improvement that money can procure. They made gas for themselves, and lighted up the entire house. In that curious mercantile millionnaire way which you never see in a real great house. Sir Thomas took followed suit, and he shook his gray head a little.

"I hope no harm will come of it," he said; "they are going very fast, poor things. Mrs. Aldgrave. I hope they are able to keep it up."

"Able!" said I; "they are frightfully rich!" and I felt half aggrieved by the very supposition.

"Yes," said Sir Thomas, "they would need to be rich. For a little while that may do; but I don't think they will be rich enough to last long enough to stand that sort of thing for a long time together."

"Oh, they can bear it, no doubt," I said, impatient of Sir Thomas's old-fashioned ways. "Of course it was very different in the Covenanters' time."

"Ah, in the Coventrys' time," said Sir Thomas, regretfully; "one does not often get such people nowadays. Well, I hope they may. Take care of that stone. And now, here we are at your door."

"Good-night!" said I, "and many thanks; but I stood looking at the baby's evening air, as Sir Thomas went home across the Green. I could see Dinglewood from my door, and the Lodge, and the Greshams' house, each in a very different way, with faint candles in Lady Denzil's chamber, and some of the servants sleeping-rooms, and the white lamp-light in the windows below; domestic and necessary lights, not like the blaze in the new house. Sir Thomas plodded solidly home, with his gray head bent and his hands behind him under his coat, in the musing tranquility of old age; and in certain shadowy corners I could see that it was my gaze at the illuminated house which made him say those uncomfortable words. I did as if I had not heard the Greshams, children, in their gayety and heedlessness the eye of some sleeping Fate.

It is reported that a Baptist clergyman in Philadelphia recently received a fifty-dollar greenback for performing the rite of baptism.

Those who say they would gladly keep awake in church, but find it impossible, can no longer offer an excuse. A remedy for sleeping has been suggested, which drowsy church-goers will find effectual. "Take a piece of horse-radish root of good size, and of a figure's length, to the sanctuary, and the moment the sermon begins put a piece in your mouth about the size of a common corn, bite and moisten it habitually with the saliva, and the eyes will not only be easily kept open, but a tearful attention may also be prosition of drowsiness till the sermon ends."

General Napier, who experienced a sun-stroke while in Sind (from which, however, he recovered), is of opinion that death by the means would be painless. He says: "I was just deadly sleepy; it was deadly but I was left alone; but the only feeling of the transition would have been a tiredness like that experienced at being suddenly waked up before it is time. This was to a degree almost to be called painful; then came a pleasant drowsiness with anger that the doctors would not let me sleep." The effect of excessive cold is very similar.

The following bill of fare is said to have met the approbation of the Chinese Embassy when at Worcester: "A Champagne Assin, Champagne, rice, Champagne, eggs, Champagne, ham, Champagne, ice water, Champagne. However, the embassy pays its own expenses!

A singular phenomenon occurred a week or two ago not far from Nashville, consisting of a small mass some men who were working on a plantation were much alarmed by an apparent opening in the clouds, which were thick and heavy. Suddenly a brilliant ball of fire seemed to overspread the intense mass of black clouds, on the centre of which appeared a fiendish like aperture about a foot or five feet in diameter, the sides of which presented the appearance of ragged flames darting like fiery tongues, and licking and lapping at the dark object passing with inconceivable rapidity down through the aperture. It grew more luminous as it approached the earth, and struck with a sound like a sudden, terrific clap of thunder, which shook the house the surrounding hills quiver to their foundations. After some hours the place where the fiery missive had struck was examined. The men found a hole where it had fallen was split and torn into fragments over a distance of about fifty feet, and stones moved out of the hole; also the mass had buried itself which was too hot to approach. Some days after the mass was found to be cool as ice, and at a depth of about twenty feet, the aerolite was found. It measured about seven feet from apex to base, and a little more in circumference at the base round. It is specifically very heavy, and the lump can be broken with a few ax or sledge blows.

Two visitors in Salt Lake City entered a shop to purchase photographs of Brigham Young and such views as they could fancy. From the former's conversation with the clerk, who, however, kept glancing uneasily at the visitors, it was plain that he was leaning on a show-case near by. After selecting the photographs and views, the visitor said, "Now show us some pictures of Mrs. Brigham Young." "Sh—sh—sh, we haven't any," whispered the clerk. "Don't you? Then show them at the other store." "Yes," replied he, with a stealthy glance at the old woman: "but we are all afraid to show them." "Can't you show us some copies—simply point them out to us?" pressed the inquisitive visitor. Here the clerk, without replying, walked away in a state of perturbation. The old woman left the store. He returned with a "Gentleman, please call for any of Brigham Young's first wives. Visitors can not be too considerate of the feelings of the ladies."

An event, both horrible and ludicrous, is reported to have occurred recently in Norfolk, Virginia. A certain individual having died, the friends and acquaintances repaired to his house to pay their last tribute of respect by following his remains to the grave. The exequies were formed; but before moving hospitalities were extended to the guests of a character befitting by the bearer, were slowly sipping their juleps, and now and then a word or a remark a slight shake to excite the ice in them, a noise was heard in the coffin, which caused some of the guests to look around for the cause before. The undertaker at length mustered courage to remove the coffin-lid, when the corpse opened one up and coolly asked for his julep. Having quenched his thirst, he stated that he had been in a sort of trance, and that he had not been quite dead, but was unable to rouse himself until the familiar jingle of the ice and julep-glasses had fallen upon his ear, and that he was indebted for his life to the system, and he was about to break the record.

Minargent, said to be an excellent substitute for silver, has lately been invented in Paris. It is composed of the following: Sixty parts of pure copper, hundred parts of pure nickel, fifty parts of pure tungsten, ten parts of pure aluminium. The ingredients are reduced to the minutest, malleability, ductility, tenacity, enormness, and density of silver, has a superior sonorousness even better. Minargent was said to be all the purposes to which silver is applicable.

In Paris no good work of demolition and reconstruction has produced great changes even within the last few months. The nature and extent of these may be inferred, perhaps, from the amount of damages awarded to owners and occupants of real estate in the Rues de la Campagne Première, du Dragon, and Vaugirard, required for the prolongation of the Boulevard Raspail. These damages to be paid in the bankers in 11,000,000 francs, and to the occupants 1,892,750 francs. The street cuts through some of the best and busiest localities in Paris.

London theives are beginning to wear the uniform of postmen, for the protection it affords the boks of street letter-boxes, and walk off with the contents in broad daylight. Have we visions of a postman's kind of look what becomes of some missing letters?

For many years the French Government have held out a large reward to any one who should discover and communicate a satisfactory test, other than that of chemical analysis, by which death could be infallibly identified. The following method, recently given to the French Government, will probably be true: Drink a lighted candle to any portion of the body; a blister will soon rise. If on puncture it gives out a dull exhausted, death has taken place; if it emits air only, it is perfectly certain that life has become entirely extinct.

California has proved admirably adapted to the luxuriant growth of the mulberry-tree, and to the cultivation of the silk-worm. Many persons are engaged in commencing this business; it is clean and healthful, and can be easily managed in a large degree by women and children. Moreover, there will always be a good demand for the products of the silk-worm.

The project of bringing Lake Superior into Ontario has been decided to be feasible, and able engineers say that it will cost about $40,000,000. It was proposed to raise $20,000,000 of this in the United States, and $20,000,000 in England. These loans were to be secured by a grant of 10,000,000 acres of land by the Canadian Government. A gentleman of Toronto has undertaken the financial management of the enterprise, and some time ago obtained guaranties from American capitalists that they would furnish $20,000,000 if the balance should be subscribed in Europe, and the land-grant secured. For several months he has been in England, and it is said that his prospects of success in his undertaking are very favorable.

"OLD HAT" MAN.

NEW YORK "STREET ARABS."

HENRY MAYHEW, in his valuable book on "London Labor and the London Poor," divides the street folk of that great city into six kinds: I. Street Sellers; II. Street Buyers; III. Street Finders; IV. Street Performers; V. Street Artisans; and VI. Street Laborers. If he had added a seventh division for Street Beggars his classification would have admirably applied to the city of New York, though American peculiarities of customs generally have produced very different classes of these characters from those of England. We have the English "costermonger" and "cheap John" in our hawkers of fish and vegetables, and our enterprising country peddlers; their tract and song sellers are generally news boys or men with us; they have many characters which we have not, and we many original to this soil; but all, in England or America, have a nature in common, and all belong to the nomadic race. Every where they are found they can be recognized as true Arabs; and strange to say, despite its privations, its dangers, and its hardships, those who have once adopted the semi-savage and wandering mode of life in early youth seldom abandon it, but continue to the end of their existence Arabs by second nature.

THE BOOT-BLACK.

"GLASS PUT IN."

Among the "Street Arabs" of New York there are many distinct characters of people. Embraced under the head are to be included pickpockets, beggars, and prostitutes that prey upon the populace, as well as the itinerant sellers, buyers, etc., who profess to make some return for what they receive; but it is only from the latter class that our present illustrations are selected. These are to be seen every day in the streets of the city.

Among the street buyers is the "old hat" man, familiar in the more secluded streets devoted to residences. His business requires him to pass slowly through the streets, calling out in tones that can hardly be distinguished, and which would not be recognized if his bundle of old hats did not proclaim his trade, "Old hats to buy—old hats!" Generally these street criers—whether buyers or sellers—are hoarse from much straining of their lungs and exposure to all sorts of weather; and their appearance and voice are alike repulsive. There are a large number of these buyers in New York, and they collect, paying cash, or making exchanges of china-ware or similar goods, every part of man's cast-off raiment, from the hat on his crown to the shoes on his feet. Many of these men are in the employ of second-hand clothes and hat dealers; and their collections, cleansed and repaired, are sold in certain districts as new clothing.

SHOE-LACE MAN.

CHINESE CANDY MAN.

The "boot-black" is better known, because of a more noisy and numerous class. He is a modern innovation. A few years ago boot-blacking in New York was done in a very different manner. The boot-blacks were then almost exclusively negro men. They had their workshops and their regular customers, whom they served with clean boots pretty much as the news-boys serve their customers with papers. Every customer was expected to have at least two pairs of boots; the boot-black called at the customer's room early every morning, taking away the dirty and leaving the clean pair. They carried them by means of a long stick thrust through the straps of the boots or strings of the shoes. This custom, as well as that of putting boots outside of one's door, at the hotel, to be blacked, has now become obsolete, and the "boot-black brigade" has carried all before it.

The glass-mender belongs to the class of street artisans, and is one of a very numerous herd. We have not only itinerant glass-menders, but repairers of tinware and furniture of all kinds, and the number of street artisans is very large. They perambulate the streets as the "hat-man" does, calling their trade, and entering the houses whenever their services are demanded.

The street sellers, however, are in the majority, and the "shoe-lace man," the "Chinese candy dealer," the "umbrella dealer," the "balloon man," and the "cigar dealer" belong to this class. Often the first, whose business requires him to remain stationary, is blind or lame, and sympathy for his misfortune frequently proves important to his success. When John Chinaman comes to New York he is almost certain to start a candy stand, and takes to that trade as naturally as an Italian to organ-grinding. The "umbrella man" is generally seen abroad only in wet weather. To the "balloon man" dry weather is absolutely necessary. His stock in trade consists of the little colored gutta-percha toy balloons so extensively manufactured for children. The cigar man is one of the nuisances of the city. He is to be found in the most frequented of the thoroughfares with a box under his arm, and half a dozen cigars in his hand, calling out, "Five for ten cents!" to passers-by. And strange to say, he finds customers among the illogical class who can not understand that cigars at the rate of two cents apiece must either be of no value or else are contraband.

THE BEGGAR-WOMAN.

The beggars are "too numerous to mention;" they are to be found every where and at all hours; and "ply their vocation" with a persistency that deserves and often provokes success. The women generally appear with babes in their arms, thus hoping to arouse sympathy, and no doubt often succeeding. An old legend has long been in circulation to the effect that these children are hired to the beggars, and that they are not, as a general thing, their mothers. How true this may be it is impossible to say.

UMBRELLA DEALER.

Curious would be the history of these characters, if it could be traced, and still more so the habits, and customs, and social and commercial organizations of these people, if they could be divulged. They begin life for themselves at a very early age—often before they are ten years of age. They find their chief amusement at their cheap "hops," the beer-shops, and the theatres; the social intercourse of the sexes is by no means delicate; concubinage is far more common than marriage; the sanctity of the marriage relation is most imperfectly understood or appreciated; and they have no religion. There is a great field for the missionary among these classes; and the various children's aid societies have done great and lasting good in it by rescuing young children from this vagabond sort of life. There is no single organized charity of New York which is more worthy of support than that known as the "Children's Aid Society," and which labors vigorously in this field.

THE BALLOON MAN.

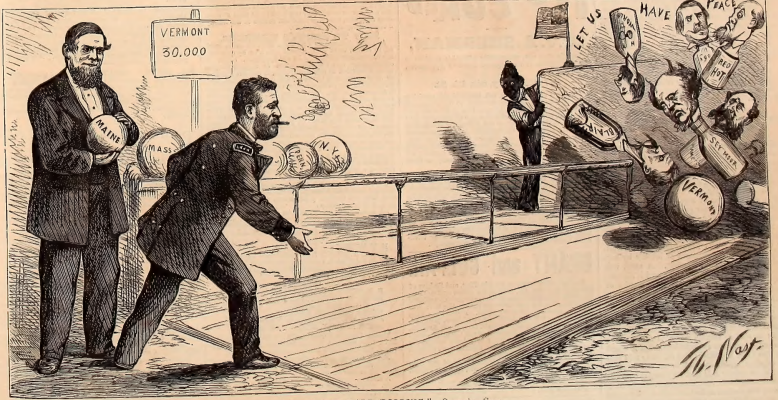
"FIVE FOR TEN CENTS."

[UNION LEAGUE CLUB-HOUSE, NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.]

UNION LEAGUE CLUB.

WE give on this page an illustration of the handsome club-house of the Union League Club, on the corner of Madison Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, in this city. It is the largest and most complete establishment of the kind in this country. The expense of furnishing it alone amounted to $60,000. There are twenty-nine rooms in the house, besides a theatre capable of seating six or seven hundred persons. There is a library and a trophy-room, besides the usual reception-rooms, parlors, saloons, etc. The exterior of the building, as can be seen from our illustration, is as imposing as the interior is elegant.

The Union League Club was organized during the late war, and was one of the first of those effective and patriotic political associations which are now so numerous in the principal cities. These clubs, which did so much during the excitement of the war to sustain the Government by material as well as moral support, are now doing great good in the dissemination of true principles among the people, and their good influence is felt in this political as well as during the bloodier struggle which preceded it.



THE GRANT MEDAL.

At a meeting on August 20, Judge JOHN H. WHITE presented to the Club a splendid bronze medal. We illustrate it on this page. It is called "The Grant Medal," and is intended to commemorate the General's military services. Five hundred of them were manufactured, by order of a Swiss Republican Club, for presentation to clubs in this country, and they are now being distributed.

WESLEYAN COLLEGE AT BELFAST.

WE illustrate on page 597 the newly-erected College of the Wesleyan Methodist connection in Ireland. This institution possesses considerable interest for the Methodist denomination in this country, as a large sum of money has been raised for it here. Methodism in Ireland has to bear the competition of the establishment supported by the Government, and the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Churches, which receive large subsidies for their support, and is, in addition, continually being weakened by the emigration to this country of large numbers of its best members. Twelve years ago an effort was made in this country to raise $100,000 for the purpose of Methodism in Ireland, country to raise $100,000 for the purpose of Methodism in Ireland, but in consequence of the financial troubles of 1857 it was abandoned, after raising $40,000. In connection with the Centenary collections of 1866 about $35,000 additional was collected, making in all about $75,000 given by the Methodists of this country for the benefit of their brethren in Ireland. Of this sum a large portion is to go toward this College at Belfast, to be used either for its building or endowment fund.

The institution combines a first-class boarding-school and day-school for boys, with a college for elder students designed for the ministry. The building stands in a healthy and agreeable situation. The foundation-stone was laid three years ago. The cost has been $80,000. The materials are red brick, with dressings or facings of freestone. The design comprises a longitudinal range of building, with two transverse wings, projecting both to front and rear; also a central rear building. The light side of the building is devoted to the collegiate department, the left to the school, the departments common to both occupying the centre. The principal entrance and president's house are copy the centre of the front; the theological tutor's and head-master's houses are placed at each side, each with a separate entrance. The main entrance and corridor for the students and boys in the centre of each return-wing, under the sidetowers. Each house is perfectly distinct and self-contained.

THE INDIAN WAR.

The impression appears to have mysteriously fastened itself upon the minds of public men that the Indian war now beginning in the Far West is to be the last of our troubles from that source, and that it is to be at the cost of the Indians. The consummation is highly desirable, though it is a great pity that more peaceful measures, which the Peace Commission of last spring might have inaugurated, are not to be the means of producing it. But it is evident that under Generals Sherman and Sheridan there is to be a vigorous prosecution of the struggle, even to the extermination of the Indian tribes. Such a purpose General Sheridan has already distinctly avowed, and neither he nor General SHERMAN are men to be turned back from their purpose by false sentiment or by humanity, and it must be candidly confessed that our former policy has been somewhat mistaken in this regard.

The late operations of the Indians have been of a painfully aggressive character. They appeared in the valley of Solomon City, Kansas, on August 16, and made such demonstrations as drove the people of the country to the city for protection, and the women were organized and fearfully outraged. WILLIAM COMSTOCK, well known as a scout, was murdered by them on August 17, and a party of children and women have been stolen by them, and either murdered or abandoned in the wilderness. On August 19 they attacked the Kiowa station, on the Smoky Hill route, capturing thirty horses and carrying off a woman and child, whose remains were found shockingly mutilated. Another band killed three men at Latham, on the Platte stage road. They were driven off the Smoky Hill coach several miles, keeping up a running fire, without doing any damage. They are stripping the country of stock and provisions. They cut the telegraph line again and again, and then abandoned the train, saving what stock they could.

In connection with these and other outrages General SHERMAN has ordered "the forcible removal of the Indians to their reservations south of the State of Kansas, and that they be compelled to deliver up the perpetrators of the guilty acts. All persons who shall harbor Indians in course with or give aid or assistance to these Indians until due notice is given that the requirements of the order have been complied with."

Our engraving on page 601 shows the manner of attacking and defending a train, and is a graphic, truthful, and timely illustration of one of these desperate encounters now so frequent on the plains.

"KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER" IN DISREPUTE.

MR. DISRAELI is begging for the distinction of the Garter. His political opponents think it an empty honor, and are sure presage of his fall. They say the Garter was a real distinction in the days of chivalry; but chivalry is dead, the Garter has become a toy, and among the statesmen of this age the toys of dignity are out of date. Ambitious women wear paste who have no diamonds to wear; and usually poor men get only by beg and bargain for the distinction of the Garter, because they are incapable of distinguishing themselves. The Blue Ribband has been seriously been used for purposes of bribery by successive English administrations. A man, who has every thing else, covets this; and if his support of the government be worth the enmity of his disappointed competitors, it is given him.

There have not indeed been wanting men of the privileged order who have declined the Garter as a thing of no value to them. The Duke of Sutzwilian, a man of superior intellect and great public as well as private worth, is said to have inquired, when it was offered him, what it would cost him to be knighted; and on being told that the expense would amount to several hundred pounds, he quietly said that he thought he could do something better with the money. Lord Mulbourne, when asked at the Coronation if he would not accept the Garter, replied, in his characteristic vein of humor: "Well, no; I don't see what would be the use of trying to bribe myself."

TAPPING LEECHES.—A NEW SURGICAL DODGE.

THE German doctors have lately been playing their leeches a droll trick—making one worm do the work of many. When the little blood-sucker has taken his fill and is about to leave, he is to be tapped; a small incision is made in his side, that serves as an outlet for the blood, and he goes on sucking, in happy ignorance at the cause of his abnormal appetite, as long as the doctor pleases. Bdellatomy is the name given to the practice, and it is urged that it is not cruel, but contrariwise since it does the leech a good turn by enabling him to enjoy his rich food indefinitely. It is said to work under the operation; but with proper treatment is soon healed, and may be incised over and over again. There was one old gentleman who used to be a leech a camel, that he might have been blessed with the seven stomachs vouchsafed by nature to that animal. If such a beast could still exist, let him seek surgical aid in some such treatment as that practiced on the leeches, that he may eat and drink ad libitum, and feel no worse.

Ir the ladies but knew what thousands of them are constantly relating to us, we candidly believe one half of the weakness, prostration and distress experienced by them would vanish. James Marsh, Esq., 159 West 14th St., N. Y., says, "he has three children, the first two are sick and puny, his wife having been unable to nurse or attend them, but she has taken PLANTATION BITTERS for the last two years, and has a child now eighteen months old which she has nursed and reared herself, and both are hearty, fat, and well. The article is invaluable to mothers," &c.

Such evidence might be continued for a volume. The above suffices to try them. They speak for themselves. Persons of sedentary habits troubled with weakness, lassitude, palpitation of the heart, &c., should, before resorting to other eating, torpid liver, constipation, diabetes, &c., will find speedy relief through these Bitters. —*N. MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

OFFICE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
No. 652 BROADWAY, Cor. Bond St., N. Y.

THE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is chartered by the State of New York.

OBJECT.

The object of this Association is to secure a cash payment to the family of each death or disability of any member as there are members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.

MEMBERSHIP FEES.

The membership fee is One Dollar, and joining (for which a policy will be furnished), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which one dollar will be given. One dollar from each member goes to the widow or children of the deceased member, and ten cents for the expenses of collecting.

INVESTMENTS.

The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the money received as new membership fees shall be kept or invested in the best payments falling due by the delinquencies of members. This fund is called by the

NATIONAL TRUST CO.,

and will be invested in United States Bonds, or real estate, or bonds and mortgage upon New York City property, which property shall be double the value of the money so invested.

THE FUNDS.

The remaining two thirds after paying the expenses of the Association, shall be invested in real estate in the City of New York, in bonds and mortgage on property in the City of New York, the interest of which shall go to the current expenses of the Association. If a deceased member leaves no heirs, the money becomes the property of the Association, with the proviso that the expenses of burial shall be paid out of certain funds, provided the same do not exceed one hundred dollars.

A member ceases to pay his 10 ct one dollar and ten cents within thirty days from date of notice, forfeits all claims upon the Association, and also forfeits all money previously paid. In the Pacific States this time is extended to sixty days. A member having no permanent residence must notify the Secretary, and request a representative to pay dues.

When members choose they can send ten dollars each thirty days to the Secretary to prepay their fees, which sum will pay for ten deaths, thus saving the trouble of sending for dues, and also for a saving of fifty cents. No man is so poor that he can not pay a few, and $1 10 accumulates, thus securing food to his heirs. The average number of dollars each person has to pay is not over $1 50 per year, and that in little over fifty cents per week. This makes this mode of insurance more economical than that where you have to pay any regular Insurance Company for a single policy.

This company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women, so as soon as three classes are filled ten new classes will be adopted. Men and women use the same, but in different classes. Every thing is done to make each class equal.

CLASSES.

In class A all persons between the ages of 15 and 20 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 20 and 25 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 25 and 30 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 40 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 45 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 50 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 55 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 60 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 65 yrs.

The classes for women are the same as above. Any one that is found to give his or her age wrong will be expelled, and the money paid in will be lost to the association. Each class is limited to 5000 members. Each person belongs to but one class, numbered, and $1 at each time a member dies belonging to the same class he or she must pay.

A member of one class can not be assessed this dollar for a member of another class. Each class is INDEPENDENT, having no connection with any other.

ILLUSTRATION.

Class "A" has 5000 members. A man dies. The Association pays over, within forty days, $500 to the widow or heirs, the remaining $500 passes forward, within thirty days, $1 10 each to the Association to replenish it, failing to send in this sum, they forfeit to the Association all moneys paid, and the Association supplies a new member in the place of the retiring one.

ADVANTAGES.

The advantages of this Association over ordinary Life Insurance companies are so plain as to need think. The fees are so small, and required to be paid at such long intervals that any man can secure to his family a competency upon his death.

HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.

Any one desiring membership in the Association must send $6, in check, bank draft, postal order, or by express, a note expressing a wish to be a member. Order to accommodate will the Association is responsible for money sent in letters. Agents are not allowed to receive moneys, but must ask for checks, &c., &c. Persons joining will receive a printed Policy, stating to it at their own risk. All checks, &c., must be payable to the order of the MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION. Persons paying the money must be a paper giving the applicant's full name, post-office address, occupation, who the policy is in favor of, post-office address, town, county, state, and Express Co't'ryhouse, setting forth the physical condition, and whether, in the opinion of the doctor examining the applicant is a proper person to be insured. Blank forms of application for membership will be furnished gratis.

Agents are not allowed to receive money but in the form of a check or postal order, made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

Each member is allowed to make new members; by so doing he benefits himself. No letter will be noticed that does not contain a three cent postage stamp to prepay return postage.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up a Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by ordering together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-half, through the Express Company, just by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and how to put on the Post-office Box, or Post-office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

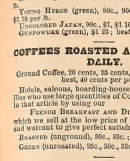
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly-discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing ten times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).



CAUTION.—As our SPLENDID WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one has done or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

"KITTY McGEE,"

HENRY TUCKER'S NEW SONG AND CHORUS . . . 25c.
LIFE IN MY HEART AND PAY NO RENT . . . . . 30c.
THE EYE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I COME . . . . 30c.
PULLING HARD AGAINST THE STREAM . . . . . 30c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Sheet Music.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 BROADWAY,
2d door above 26th St. Branch, 180 Bowery.

WATCH. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and combinations are such that the wearing judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogisms of the press in consequence of its peculiar qualities, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as the Watch goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as strictly time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $22.

A Price-List will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege.

Health Depends upon Good Digestion.

"Weakness of the Stomach" is the source of more evils than is generally contained in Pandora's Box. Debility, headache, nervous tremors, palpitation of the heart, and local pains innumerable, are its direct consequences. It obscures the intellect, and gives birth to the most horrible and incoherent fancies, precipitates a man for business, and renders persistent exertion next to impossible. Yet, strange to say, suitable remedies are the most neglected of all ailments—and this is the more extraordinary from the fact that an absolute, infallible specific for the disorder can be obtained in every city, town, and village of the United States.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

takes as wide a range as the malady which it cures. It pervades every civilized portion of the Western Hemisphere, and its celebrity as a tonic and alterative is every where unbounded. It is due to the common sense of the American public to say that the demand for it is immense, and continually on the increase: but still thousands continue to suffer from dyspepsia, with the great fact staring them in the face that a remedy for it exists, as it were, within arm's length of every sufferer. Such is the inconsistency of human nature. It is to be regretted that a number of those who manifest this insane indifference to their own health and comfort diminishes; and the time will come, it is confidently believed, when the disease will be expelled from the category of prevalent disorders by the incomparable alterative and restorative.

$30 PER WEEK AND EXPENSES.—Agents wanted, male and female, local and traveling. Parties preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. 25 specimens, pictures, catalogue, and particulars sent on receipt of 30 cents postage. SHUTTLE & CO., 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: ITS ORIGIN, AND AN ACCOUNT OF ITS PROGRESS DOWN TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. Vol. II. now ready. With Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

Whatever opinion may be formed of some of the author's theories, no one can fail to allow that he has use clearly devoted the utmost patience to the sifting of a mass of facts, and that a less laborious and clear-sighted writer would have been confused, if not overwhelmed, by them. The graphic, unlabored style which first made their author famous are still maintained in the present work, and even the reader of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill.—Saturday Review.

By a happy fortune the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable episode in history, with which the national honor is scarcely inferior to that of the combatants themselves. . . . He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what, to him, is both a public and a private duty. He has instituted a careful survey of the localities: he has consulted and collected dispatches and correspondence without end; he has personally questioned many of the statesmen and warriors, with almost all the leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured on the scene, and he has put together a mass of information perhaps unequaled in part-narrative for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Fraser's Magazine.

(In regard to the Charge of the Light Brigade.) Mr. Kinglake, in our opinion, is never the case in its diverse aspects, clearly and impartially, and is disposed rather to attribute the blame than to set down aught in malice. . . . Mr. Kinglake in his present volume has done ample justice to himself in saying nothing. Few non-professional men have ever so completely mastered the details of the art of war, or described military events with such graphic power; fewer still can clothe their impressions in such pure and nervous English.—Examiner.

Mr. Kinglake has exhibited extraordinary power as a historian in his account of the Battle of Inkerman. Its bewildering fog with the varied scenes of the moments of that terrible action—the care and industry with which he has weighed the several and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and knowledge of character which he has brought to bear upon the subject—the clearness of his descriptions—and the general vividness of the narrative, which often seems to glow with the light and echo with the roar of mortal combat, combine to form one of the most remarkable pieces of writing that has ever come from our literature.—Spectator.

Most fortunate has been the choice of a historian in his account of the Battle of Balaklava. Mr. Kinglake, in our opinion, has done all the requirements of that terrible action—the care and industry with which he has weighed the several and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and knowledge of character which he has brought to bear upon the subject—the clearness of his descriptions—and the general vividness of the narrative, which often seems to glow with the light and echo with the roar of mortal combat, combine to form one of the most remarkable pieces of writing that has ever come from our literature. Sometimes composed in the spirit of military criticism —calm, cool, and observant—and at others in that of some modern prose Homer, who feels the inspiration of the fight, and kindles with the personal heroism of individual actors. It shows throughout the hand of a master in this species of writing.—London Review.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of buyers of Silver-plated Forks and Spoons to a valuable patented improvement in Electro-plating spoons and forks, by which those parts most exposed to wear receive an EXTRA COAT OF SILVER, THREE TIMES THE USUAL THICKNESS—viz., on the back of the handle, and breast and points of tines of forks, as illustrated in cut; back of the handle, heel of the bowl, and points of bowls of spoons.

It is confidently believed that this mode of Electro-plating will supersede the old way of plating. The great advantage will be readily seen, as forks and spoons always wear through on these exposed points, while the plate is yet good on other parts of the article. This new process will add

THREE TIMES TO THE DURABILITY OF GOODS SO PLATED.

All goods stamped "1847, Rogers Bros., A 1, XII.," are Electro-plated by the new Patented Process. Patented OCTOBER 29th, 1867, and FEBRUARY, 1868.

THE DECLARATION.

SOME facetious writer on the tender passion has demonstrated by what he announces to be actual calculation that no two men ever told their love precisely in like manner, and he argues from that calculation that the art of love-making can not be taught save by experience, and generally and experience at that. Those who have had large experience in that way confirm the writer's opinion, if not his calculation, and it is more than probable that he is right, so very different are the circumstances and sensations in and under which the delicate subject is approached. All animate and inanimate nature, from domestic cats to wild flowers, polished diamonds to uncouth mineral collections, have done duty in "leading" to a declaration. The romantic-looking youth in Mr. GOODALL'S picture on this page has evidently made good use of the wild flower medium.

It is a little curious, too, to observe how differently the poets approach the same topic. The immortal WILLIAMS is always stately and delicate; MILTON stately, too, but cold; BURNS always warm and imaginative; MOORE invariably impassioned; and BYRON a little too ardent. And the artists are also of different minds on this highly important subject, and no two of them paint

"THE DECLARATION."—[FROM A PAINTING BY F. GOODALL.]

Love exactly alike. But still the universal passion is alike in all times and countries, and the "old, old story" which our picture tells is the same in substance, if not in treatment, all the wide universe over. Undoubtedly so universal a passion, thus generally adopted and accepted, must be good to own, and with this sage conclusion we commend our picture and the world's experience (not our own) to our readers, and advise them in all love and kindness to "go and do likewise"—that is, like the wise man in the illustration.

CONCILIATION.

MR. PENDLETON and the other Democratic orators continually preach conciliation. They proclaim that the success of SEYMOUR and BLAIR will be a true millennium. It will be the dayspring of peace and good-will. Indeed, the Reverend Chalkhand himself could not more unctuously set forth the blessedness of forgiveness than these gentlemen.

Now, true policy in public affairs is not only good, but it is politic. A government which emerges victorious from a domestic struggle commits the greatest of blunders if it adopts a vindictive policy toward its opponents, or even if it proceeds to full legal extremities. When England suppressed the Jacobite risings in 1715 and 1745 the Government put many of the rebels to death. But it was not sound policy. When JEFFERSON DAVIS was captured in the most ignominious plight many Englishmen said that of course he would be hung. One eminent Englishman remarked that there was not a government in Europe, England included, that would not hang him.

The Republican party controlling the Government of the United States were much wiser. They have not shed the blood of a single rebel in vengeance for the protracted rebellion. That was never so great and victorious a party so humane and just and wise. If the defeated rebels were, as they confessed, of another country," they surely could not expect to be treated as citizens of this. If they were not of another country, but traitors baffled in an attempt to overthrow the Government, they might be put to be hung. But the United States authorities rejecting all thought of punishment for the past, considered only how to secure the future. They said: "Some of the leaders must, as an obvious guarantee of good order, be for the present disfranchised; for the rest, every body shall equally share in political power." And in this they did not say until those leaders had haughtily defied them. The magnanimity of this policy lay in its unprovoked moderation; its wisdom was shown in the creation of a loyal constituency.

Now what is the conciliation which Mr. PENDLETON and the other orators propose? It is not a new demand with them. When WADE HAMPTON and FORREST and LEE were at the throat of the nation, these same gentlemen advised conciliation by submitting to the rebellion. Now that FORREST and HAMPTON have been defeated in the field and hope to save their cause at the polls, these gentlemen advise the same conciliation by surrender. In other words they insist that FORREST, HAMPTON, and their friends shall have political power in their States to the exclusion of loyal men. Mr. PENDLETON is in favor of the conciliation of black codes and the good-will of the Ku-Klux Klan. The millennium will be mellifluously preached, revivals held in Georgia by the expulsion of the colored members; in South Carolina and other States by the alternative offered to the colored population of submitting to their own degradation or starvation; in the country at large by the demand of the candidate whom he supports that the supremacy of the Southern States shall be overturned by the sword. The conciliation preached by such apostles as Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. COX is such as has become classically known to the people of the United States—it is letting the most troublesome, spiteful, and dangerous people in the country have their own way.

Against these apostles of a peace bought by abject submission of the moral conviction and intelligence of the country to its ignorance and passion, and baffled hate, the Republican party proclaims the conciliation of common-sense, the good-will of justice, the peace founded upon the only possible ground—the control of enduring peace by free country—equal rights. Upon that GRANT and the Republicans. There standing they have conquered once, and there standing they will conquer forever.

AN ELOQUENT APPEAL.

THE reply of the colored citizens of South Carolina to the insolent Democratic address which told them they might choose between voting for SEYMOUR and BLAIR and starvation is one of the most admirable documents of the campaign. Contrasted with the speeches of WADE HAMPTON, COBB, SEMMES, TOOMBS, and the other Southern Democratic leaders, with the articles in the Southern Democratic papers, and the action of the Georgia Legislature, it is wisdom beside folly. But, apart from its excellent temper and its unanswerable argument, it contains a vivid picture of the proposed Democratic policy toward that part of the population of the United States for which it speaks. And that every Northern voter may understand what kind of power is to be exercised when Mr. FRANK BLAIR'S policy of overthrowing the Southern governments by the sword is carried out, let him remark this extract from the reply of which we speak:

"When your Legislature met in 1865–66 you passed that infamous black code which is a disgrace to civilization. In that you denied us all rights in common with other people in the State; you by these acts denied our children the schoolhouse; you imposed penalties upon us which were not imposed on others; there were outrages for which, if committed by a white man, he was imprisoned, but if committed by a black man he was hung. We submitted to that whether that course was not enough to make us disbelieve every protestation of love which you make. Your laws provided for taking and binding out your children, and subjecting us to all manner of disabilities. We could not pursue any trade or calling in this State without a written permission from the Judge of your town, or we could sell any article of barter without the consent first obtained from some magistrate."

After declaring that such a policy necessarily alienated the sympathy of Northern voters, and that if the Democratic leaders had accepted in good faith the proposed reconstruction, they would have made a handful of unprincipled negro votes for Southern instead of Northern white men for office, the address pertinently asks, "Can you ask us to sustain a party which is pledged to put us all back under the power from which we now enjoy?" And in a strain which will find the most sincere response in every generous and manly American heart, the address concludes: "If we are to be measured by this cause we refuse to vote the Democratic ticket; if we are to be murdered in cold blood because we will not suffer ourselves to be cowed by the threats of assassins, we can die but once. and if, as you state, thirty millions of white men are going to fall upon four millions because they are black, and will not vote for HORATIO SEYMOUR and F. P. BLAIR for President and Vice-President of the United States, both of whom have declared that the measures of the Radical party of the past are prepared to die, but not to vote to be killed. ..... We ask nothing at the hands of our fellowman but a fair chance in the race of life, and equal opportunities for ourselves, our wives, and our children. We ask no more."

THE DEBT AND ITS PAYMENT.

THE Democratic misrepresentations of the actual financial condition of the country have been often more, and sometimes less, exposed by Mr. EDWARD ATKINSON, of Boston, in a speech at the Republican State Convention in Massachusetts. His statements are very clear, and are founded upon facts furnished by the Hon. DAVID A. WELLS. Mr. ATKINSON himself is known as a careful student of all financial questions.

First, as to the actual debt in 1865. The sum entered upon the books of the Treasury on the first of August of that year, and published as the whole debt was $2,757,689,571. But this was not the real total. There was a further liability by which the Government was as much bound as if the bonds had been already issued. This will be found in the pay of the troops to the time of their possible discharge, for their transportation, and for the settlement of contracts. This liability brought the true debt at that time to $3,287,733,329, of which, since that date, the Republican party has paid more than $800,000,000.

The receipts, beginning with April 1, 1865, to June 30, 1868, has been from customs $548,978,848, from the internal revenue $812,336,178, miscellaneous, including direct taxes, premium upon gold, and sales of captured and naval stores and captured and abandoned land, $178,743,769, making altogether $1,540,058,795. How has this sum, equal to three-fifths the amount of the present debt, been spent?

In April, 1865, the military and naval forces of the Union were enormous and most efficient. There were nearly a million of men in active service, and preparations for vigorous war had been made. Suddenly the armed rebellion ended. The Government could not at once dismiss its soldiers and sailors, turn off the wounded and disabled to shift for themselves, and repudiate its promise to those who had contracted to build ships which had been half finished, or those who had engaged to furnish food, clothing, and ordnance. Yet the credit of the Government was very low. On the 1st of April, 1865, there were overdue more than $120,000,000; and large payments of what were strictly war expenses were carried over into the year after the war. Within fifteen months from April 1, 1865, the disbursements of the Army and Navy Departments were $774,865,854, and not less than $400,000,000 of this sum was for expenses incurred and accounts rendered from three to twelve months before the end of hostilities. The rest of the whole amount was made up of pay of the army, prize-money, commissary and quarter-masters' accounts, bounties, arrears, and medical departments. This was in every sense a war expenditure; and to this might be added pensions, equalization of bounties, reimbursement of States, and claims of loyal men, etc., amounting to $145,912,401. And this, added to the sum upon the books of the Treasury, makes the maximum of the war debt $3,287,733,329. The net debt on the 30th June, 1868, was $2,485,000,000, showing that we have already paid off $802,733,329, being a payment in three years of much peace as we have had of a quarter of the whole war debt. But we have also paid the interest on the war debt for that time to the amount of $438,484,883; and these sums, deducted from the revenue of that time already mentioned, and about which no dispute, Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR and his friends are so anxious, leave the ordinary expenses at $298,840,-319, or a little more than $99,000,000 a year. Those of the last Democratic fiscal year under JAMES BUCHANAN, computed in the same currency, were $107,577,400—and that money was largely spent to arm and equip the rebel States against the Government.

Mr. ATKINSON justly claims that this exposition shows that the Republican party have managed the finances with a success hitherto unprecedented. His statements of the present situation are worthy the most thoughtful attention. The taxation is now reduced $167,000,000, and when Mr. PENDLETON says that they amount to $300,000,000 a year he says what he might prove to be untrue. Moreover, taxation at the present rate of $8 60 per head will pay our debt before the end of the year 1884. Immigration is constant. The increase since the war gives a probability of nearly 300,000,000 immigrants by to our resources. Industry is multiplying: railroads extending; agriculture improving: even in its present condition the Southern States are about to be restored and during the last year a crop of 3,000,000 bales of cotton, tobacco enough to be one of the chief dependences of taxation, and more than enough to supply all home market for the year. With GRANT and assured peace and consequent investment of capital and quickened production, the result may be easily foreseen.

The country is greatly indebted to the misrepresentation of the Democratic leaders for the clear and decisive statements of Mr. ATKINSON, Mr. WELLS, and Mr. PRESIDENT. And there is not an honest man in the land, however heavily pressed by the taxation which the rebellion and the Democratic opposition party has imposed upon us all, who does not ask the Democratic orators who paint the horrors of taxation, "And how will your policy of civil war lighten the taxes?"

THE DROUGHT IN ENGLAND.

THE extent of this visitation may now be estimated with tolerable certainty, though it is very evident that those who are obliged to make large purchases from others are disposed to produce as low an impression as possible of their own crops. Making allowance for this tendency—due in part to the political situation, and in part to the natural comfortable—we can understand why it is that, notwithstanding the admitted damage to all the other products of the soil in England, and especially to all the root crops, the yield of wheat, compared with that of both winter and spring wheat, is beyond an average. The Daily News stated that the potato crop promised a good crop can not be overestimated; and we may suppose that financial and political considerations coincide in restricting the press from admissions that would be likely to excite great caution as they will be used. Mr. SANDERSON'S letter with respect to the crops, which was published extensively in the newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic, claimed that about 100,000 more acres of land had been devoted this year to wheat than usual, and he estimated the average yield at 24 bushels per acre, although about 22 bushels was the accepted average estimate as late as 1860. The London Mail questions the accuracy of Mr. SANDERSON'S views, as they were based on the reduction of winter wheat on deep soils, and did not purport to furnish any reliable data with respect to considerable districts in which the soils are light. Mr. SANDERSON omitted also to take into view the effect of the drought on spring wheat, which shared in the injury inflicted on spring crops generally. The most reliable private intelligence within our reach we judge that the wheat crop is below the average production; but it is not unexpected, inasmuch as other crops are deficient, and as bread is called upon to supply the place of vegetables, that whatever may be the extent of the wheat crop, the price of wheat at London and Liverpool will depend mainly on what may be imported from other markets. This we have contended for as one of the results of the drought; but we are inclined to the opinion that England has reached the condition when the price of this grain will be determined hereafter mainly by the price in foreign markets. Russia, our most important competitor, will have less wheat to sell this year than usual, the drought having extended along the Baltic and the Black Sea, and exposed large districts to serious famine. India has followed France in opening her ports to the admission of the cereals; and it is probable that DARTZIC, which sends wheat to Great Britain of a very superior quality, will not have her usual supplies, owing in part to the same general cause.

The old stock of grain is found to be low in all parts of the world, and hence the new crop of every wheat will be in demand at remunerative prices, as soon as the situation becomes widely known. As this grain is transported with more advantage than any other, the law seems to be quite general that where it is exported countries from year to year under a plan of cultivation which exhausts the soil of its wheat-bearing qualities, and thus it happens that its production scarcely keeps pace with the growth of population. England enjoys the great merit of enriching her lands and of adding, by judicious cultivation, to what they produce per acre; but in the United States a plan of rapid and serious exhaustion is pursued, which will ultimately tell upon our prosperity. We shall have a large surplus to export; but it should be the policy of our farmers to hoard a part of every year's production, until the succeeding crop is assured. It constitutes a wealth which can not, in that form take wings and fly away; which does not, like our bonds and money, tempt the cupidity of robbers, and the precaution may prevent very ill effects.

We notice in the Manchester Guardian a communication from a very intelligent correspondent, who affirms that the late potatoes in his own grounds and those of his neighbors are "no larger than sparrow's eggs," and that after the rains which occurred on the eleventh and twelfth of August these small tubers had begun to sprout. He estimates the potato crop of ordinary years as second only to wheat, and is evidently disturbed at the prospect. A rise was occasioned in Cork on the 31st of August in consequence of the operations of one MARTIN, who had carried up the price of potatoes from 6d. per 21 pounds to 1s. for this quantity. At first these prices—which are applied as the having terminated the drought—there was a very general sowing of turnips to take the place of those destroyed by the drought; but it appeared that a week had passed in some districts without rain, and although the belief was expressed that turnips would grow sufficiently to afford food for sheep, there was more apprehension as to the result. The growth of grass for the fortnight preceding the 31st of August had changed the color of all pastures, and afforded, as is said, "a nibble for sheep and cattle."

Those agricultural laborers whose main reliance is upon the potato will undoubtedly consumes further corn, which is received in England from the Black Sea, from Egypt, and this country. Supplies are now going in from the Black Sea sufficient to check the advance in this market for the present, although it is now at about $1 21 to $1 22 for Mixed Western, which is the kind commonly exported. One of our contemporaries lately advised that in time of the potato famine in 1846–47 Indian corn was sent to Ireland, and rejected as an article of food. Since that time it has constantly gone forward, and as the people are cooking it into tasty cakes, and must have become disseminated it has become a regular necessity. In 1866, 9,889,232 bushels, and, in 1867, 12,187,164 bushels of corn were exported by us to Great Britain—a quantity that will be largely exceeded by this year's export.

Since our first articles were written on the subject of the drought a considerable advance has taken place in the Liverpool market in various of our productions. It has been considerable in bacon, lard, tallow, rosin, spirits of turpentine, and cheese, much to the advantage of the United States; and we look upon it as certain that the extreme scarcity of food in England, that wheat would fall to about 5s. per quarter, based ostensibly on the extent of their own crop, but actually on their power over foreign markets, will not be sustained. The Mark Lane Express of August 31 says significantly that "it to run down prices is to produce a false confidence, and to authorize a wasteful expenditure." There will undoubtedly be a brisk demand upon our productions, and consequently an active trade.

HOW THE ENEMY WORK.

"THE Tarboro Southerner," a North Carolina paper, speaking of certain officers for the town appointed by Governor HOLDEN, says: "So far as the individual capacity and fitness of those gentlemen are concerned the community generally can have no cause of complaint, and their appointment gives as much satisfaction as could be the case with any community that was unjustifiably in a state of revolution." It then adds, that being appointed by Governor HOLDEN they must be presumed to be supporters of GRANT; that continued silence will be an acknowledgment of that fact; and that the people of the town will "bestow their trade and patronage" accordingly.

General LAWLER, a wealthy planter and commission merchant in Alabama, following the advice of WADE HAMPTON, announces that he will employ no man "who is his enemy."

Mr. A. T. STEWART is one of the GRANT electors for the State of New York. Suppose that he should declare that he would employ no man who would not vote for GRANT. Suppose this practice should become universal in this country. It would soon be a government of capitalists only.

Meanwhile such facts show both the spirit and the method of what is truly called the rebel Democracy, and should put every loyal man upon his guard.

MAINE.

MAINE joins Vermont in setting the tune for the great chorus of GRANT and Peace, COLFAX and Honesty, which will rise exultingly upon all sides in November. The result of the election, after the most searching and thorough canvass upon both sides, not only shows that Maine is steady, but that the heart of the country is true to the principles for which it so lately terribly fought and suffered. The most skillful efforts of the most specious Democratic orators have not availed to confuse the mind of the people of Maine. When Mr. PENDLETON told them that they were horribly burdened with taxes, their good sense answered, "Who occasioned them?" When Mr. COX showed them their deserted wharves, the same good sense replied, "Who sent SEMMES to sea?" When Mr. JAMES BROOKS decried the subjection of the Southern whites to the blacks, the same good sense asked, "Is it the blacks who coerce WADE HAMPTON or WADE HAMPTON who coerces the blacks?" They did not deny the pressure of taxation, nor the interruption of trade, nor the confusion at the South, but when they were asked who are the authors of all this misfortune they came straight to the polls on Monday, and unmistakably answered.

The result must be taken as an indication that the people fully comprehend the emergency, and see that GRANT and COLFAX, with all loyal men supporting them, and not SEYMOUR and BLAIR, with the Ku-Klux Klan, are the representatives of a true peace and a lasting prosperity. From this day forward, therefore, thanking God for the steadfastness of Maine and Vermont, let us work more vigilantly than ever, that the victory may not only be sure, but conclusive.

AN APOSTLE OF PUBLIC ECONOMY.

MR. HOFFMAN, the Democratic candidate for Governor of New York, is stumping the State. When a candidate has the gift of oratory this is a very proper and useful thing for him to do. He becomes personally known to the voters; he sees the State which he hopes to be called to govern, and he can make himself familiar with its advantages and resources; and, not to put too fine a point upon it, the people, on their part, have an opportunity of taking the measure of the man who is a candidate for its highest executive office. In his little tour through the State we observe that Mr. HOFFMAN has much to say of enormous taxation, of the virtues of economy, and kindred topics always welcome to a tax-paying people. But while Mr. HOFFMAN freely denounces the extravagance and corruption of the Republican party we do not remark that he illustrates his views by very copious citations of the economy of the Democrats when in power, and especially he seems to refrain from obtruding his personal experience, or even participation, in that economy upon the attention of his audiences. Probably his modesty forbids. But Mr. HOFFMAN must not let his modesty harm him. Let him conquer his natural reluctance and speak out.

Thus, when he has closed a fine period upon economy and the waste of the people's money, let him say: "I, for instance, gentlemen, am Mayor of New York. For that office I receive a salary of $7500. I also sign the ordinances of the Board of Supervisors. For that little service I am paid $5000 more. Then, as a Commissioner of the Sinking Fund, I draw $1000 more. I know where the people's money goes, and I hope that I have a right to talk of economy and shameful waste." But Mr. HOFFMAN is also Grand Sachem of Tammany, and an active partner of what the Democratic delegate from Kings County, Mr. MORRIS, calls the Tammany Ring. Mr. HOFFMAN's friend and partner in this enterprising association, Mr. PETER B. SWEENY, receives as City Chamberlain $10,000. For paying over the State taxes $2000 more. As a fellow-Commissioner of the Sinking Fund he is paid $1000 more; and as County Treasurer, the excellent Mr. SWEENY, to whom Republican extravagance is extremely obnoxious, pockets $10,000 more. Has not Mr. HOFFMAN peculiar reason to know about lavish expenditures and horrible extravagance?

But not content with calling the Grand Sachem of Tammany and his partners in the promotion of public economy a Ring, Mr. MORRIS, without the least regard to the finer feelings of Sachems and City Chamberlains, asks: 'Suppose the Tammany clique, with its unfinished Court-house [a monument of Mr. HOFFMAN's Democratic economy], and its thousand other schemes of robbery and plunder, controlled the political power of the State or nation [by electing Mr. Grand Sachem HOFFMAN Governor, for instance], with what face could any honest man talk about corruption in the opposition party?" The reply is evident: with the face of Mr. Grand Sachem HOFFMAN.

Modesty forbids Mr. HOFFMAN to declare that he, the candidate of a party which, by his lips, so lustily denounces corruption, and shouts aloud for economy, is the very head of the most enormous system of public corruption and extravagance in the country—so vast, indeed, as to provoke indignant exposure from his own political friends. The modesty of representing JEFFERSON DAVIS as an apostle of loyalty to the Union is only surpassed by that of the Grand Sachem of Tammany in presenting himself as the apostle of economy and retrenchment.

THE EXPULSION OF THE GEORGIA MEMBERS.

THE facts of the expulsion of the colored members of the Georgia Legislature are simple, and deserve grave consideration. The old slave code of Georgia made a citizen ineligible to office upon seven grounds, of which color was not one. But it provided tha one-eighth of negro or African blood should deprive a man of the rights of citizenship. The new Constitution of Georgia, under which this Legislature sits and acts, abolishes the whole of the old slave code which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the Constitution of the State. The fourteenth amendment makes the native or naturalized colored person a citizen, and forbids any State to abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States. The State Constitution substantially repeats this provision. In the Convention that framed it the proposition was distinctly presented that "white men only shall be eligible to any office of trust, honor, or profit," and it was summarily rejected by a vote of 103 to 19. The only condition of eligibility for election as a member of the Legislature prescribed by the Convention was that the candidate should be a "loyal citizen."

There is no question that the expelled members were thus qualified, and they have been removed only because the Constitution did not expressly make them eligible—an argument which would unseat every white member. They were expelled because of an assumption, for no proof was offered, of ineligibility under a code which has been abolished; and they were deprived of their votes before they were unseated. This action was managed by ROBERT TOOMBS and other Democratic leaders. It is a gross and significant outrage, for a representative could be as lawfully expelled for age or weight as for color. But let every voter remember this is the kind of peace which the Democratic party proposes. The will of ROBERT TOOMBS is to be the law of Georgia, if the party can make it so. His will was the law for a dozen years before 1860, and we have seen the kind of peace it produced.

An event so monstrous as this expulsion will do more to teach the colored population the value of Democratic protestations than a thousand arguments; and it reveals the spirit and purpose of the Southern Democratic leaders as plainly as an act of secession.

A DEMOCRATIC LEADER.

AMONG the Democratic leaders who vigorously denounce General GRANT and Republican corruption is HOWELL COBB, of Georgia. This gentleman was once Democratic Speaker of the House of Representatives; then Mr. BUCHANAN's Secretary of the Treasury, and while in that office was one of the chief rebel conspirators. Subsequently he was a Brigadier-General, without distinction, in the rebel army, and now he is one of the most foul-mouthed slanderers of loyal men, and an active supporter of SEYMOUR and BLAIR.

When this patriotic individual was Secretary of the Treasury, and already an active conspirator, he came to the city of New York with a large quantity of United States securities in blank. "After slandering the stocks," says Mr. SPINNER, the Treasurer of the United States, "traducing the credit of the Government, and announcing his opinion that they would never be paid but that he must have the money for them at any rate, he offered them on the market and filled up the interest blanks at such rate as his political friends chose to ask him to insert." This was the famous twelve per cent. per annum loan; and Mr. SPINNER says that most of these securities were paid in gold with the exorbitant interest added, after the war had begun, and when, notwithstanding the war, the Government was obtaining loans at 6 per cent. per annum.

Just before this transaction Mr. Secretary HOWELL COBB had used the money in the Treasury, intended to pay the current expenses of the Government, in buying up six per cent. bonds of the United States with many years yet to run at twenty per cent. above their par value. That is, he bought immatured six per cent. stocks at 120; and immediately, in profound peace and when money was abundant, sold securities at par and stipulated to pay at the end of one year 112.

This, as the intelligent reader perceives, was "chivalry," "honor,' and "high-toned, gentlemanly statesmanship." It was part of the rebellion. It was skillfully intended to ruin the credit of the Government, so as to make secession easy and sure. Is it any wonder that HOWELL COBB warmly advocates SEYMOUR and repudiation now, hoping to ruin the credit of the Government which he and his fellow-conspirators have not yet been able to destroy, and so to paralyze all its action against future trouble of the same kind?

HOWELL COBB is a fair illustration of the Democratic leaders who denounce Republican extravagance and corruption. Is this a man whose counsels are likely to promote the peace or maintain the honor and power of the Union?

TAXING THE BONDS.

IN a late speech Mr. SANFORD E. CHURCH, for whom, in the Democratic Convention, Mr. TILDEN cast the vote of New York, while he was engaged in preparing the famous "coup-de-thimble-rig," asked why the Government does not tax the bonds? The reason seems to be evident enough. The Committee of Ways and Means in Congress, when they were instructed to report a bill levying a tax of ten per cent. upon the bonds, conclusively answered Mr. CHURCH's question, by saying that such a law would simply be a provision to pay ten per cent. less than was agreed for, and the result would be that the Government could never again raise money except upon the most ruinous terms. For who would lend to a man who might compute the amount of the loan as he pleased? Taxation is repudiation to the amount of the tax. There can be nothing plainer. Consequently no Government has ever taxed its own stocks, or permitted them to be taxed by any authority under its control.

Mr. CHURCH has been Controller of the State, was chairman of the committee upon the financial article in the late Constitutional Convention, and has been called, with the fatal facility of the Democratic papers in speaking of their politicians, a "statesman." Having asked why the Government does not tax its own bonds, he answered his question in this manner: "Why, because this Radical party, which started out with the inscription upon its banner, 'Free soil, free men, and free speech,' have become so degraded as to be now the mere bottle-holders of the bond-holders. That is the reason they have not done it."

This is wholly unworthy of Mr. CHURCH, and certainly showed his profound contempt for his audience. It is such talk as this which justifies the remark of the Treasurer of the United States, that "the Democratic demagogues are educating the people to ignorance and rascality."

THE PRESIDENT'S PREFERENCE.

WHEN General GRANT was lately in Chicago, he was asked by a friend whether JOHNSON was for him or for SEYMOUR. GRANT smiled and replied: "Well, I reckon that when he thinks of SEYMOUR he's for me, and when he thinks of me he's for SEYMOUR."

INTERESTING.

"IT is interesting," says a Democratic paper, "to observe how the military supporters of GRANT one by one turn out to have been cruel and bad men." SHERMAN, for instance, and THOMAS, and SHERIDAN, and MEADE.

It is equally interesting, on the other hand, to see how the military supporters of SEYMOUR turn out to have been humane and patriotic men. FORREST, for instance, and RAPHAEL SEMMES, and HOWELL COBB. And had they but lived, QUANTRELL and WIRZ would have been added to the number.

WHICH IS THE CONSERVATIVE?

WADE HAMPTON says that the cause of the late rebellion is not lost, that reconstruction by Congress is revolutionary and void, and should be overturned by the sword. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, the Postmaster-General of the Rebel Confederacy, says: "The duty of the Southerners is to obey the laws; accept the situation with regard to suffrage as it now stands; and, like true and honest men, to labor for the restoration of peace and harmony between the sections." Which is the conservative of these two men, and which course is the way of peace?

"NO VIOLENCE; NO SCURRILITY."

THE New York World must look to its laurels. One of its disciples says in its own favorite strain of "dignity and candor:"

"Rip Van Winkle, waking up from his nap of twenty years, if his eyes had beheld such a sight as is presented by this mongrel, carpet-bagging, and scalla-wagging party, with the Butcher GRANT as its leader, would have closed his eyes and implored the god of sleep for another lease of twenty years, to escape the hideous ravings of these vampires."

SOUND DOCTRINE.

A Democratic paper in Talladega, Alabama, begins an article by saying: "Personal and political liberty are both necessary to develop the highest style of man." The article continues: "Those who would elevate the negro from his proper level are but a few steps, if any, in advance of him."

"It is hard to convey to others," said the old preacher, "ideas which we ourselves are not possessed of, for in so doing we are apt to communicate opinions which it is very difficult to eradicate them."

LIKE LIKES LIKE.

THE New York World lately called General GRANT "GRANT, the Great American Barkis, or dumb-waiter," and in the same issue alluded to General LEE as "this grand old soldier." The next day it remarked that "the Democratic speakers treat General GRANT with marked courtesy and forbearance." Considering that the "Great American Barkis" forced "this grand old soldier" to surrender, and brought the rebellion to an end, it is very generous on the Democratic speakers to treat him with forbearance.

WARMTH AND VENTILATION IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

THE annual Report of Mr. JAMES L. MILLER, Superintendent of Buildings and Repairs to the Board of Education, is this year peculiarly interesting. We are glad to see that at length those who have the charge of public instruction are awake to the importance of the proper warming and ventilation of school buildings. Mr. MILLER was, by past experience as a builder, well qualified to supply the improvements which were so much needed, and his Report shows that the summer vacation has been well occupied in this all-important work. But this time has been too limited to meet all the necessities of our public schools. Let the work go on. We should have new buildings on improved plans; and those which we already have should be so modified as to give the thousands of pupils who attend our schools sufficient warmth and at the same time a fresh and healthy atmosphere.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MAINE ELECTION.

THE Maine election took place on September 14, and, after the hardest contested canvass since 1863, the Republican candidate for Governor was elected by about 20,000 majority—a gain of above 8000 over the majority of 1867, when the issues involved and candidates on both tickets were the same. It is about the same as the vote for President in 1864; and this result is indicative of a much larger gain in November next. The following table shows the Republican majorities in the State since the close of the war:

1865.	Republican majority	22,821
1866.	" "	27,690
1867.	" "	11,342
1868.	" " about	20,000

The Republicans have gained two State Senators, the Democrats having only two votes in that body. The Congressional delegation is wholly Republican; and in every way the rule of the Republicans has been strengthened.

Boston thinks of sending female physicians to China. Fung and Teh both favor the project, as according to Chinese custom when an empress is sick the doctor is not admitted to her presence, but sits outside the door, and examines her pulse by holding a string attached to her body. A Boston female, it is supposed, would be readily admitted to her bedside.

The Midnight Mission Society of New York, for reclaiming fallen women, reports that from May 1 to September 1, seventy-seven women were received into the house; forty-six abandoned street-life, fourteen of them getting good, honest situations; and twenty-two returned to the pave.

Several outrages on negroes are reported from Kentucky. A party of whites, while attacking the negroes in Versailles, were attacked in turn by the citizens, who organized and drove them away.

Five millions of dollars are annually expended in private and public charities in New York State. The expenditure needs organizing, as the loose manner of conducting it encourages pauperism.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Episcopal Archbishop of Armagh says that the disestablishment of the Irish Church will render Ireland a separate State. This is an instance in which opposition to the wish is father to the thought.

The Sultan of Turkey accorded permission, in the most "gracious" manner, to Admiral Farragut to pass the Dardanelles. He was doubtless afraid that the Admiral, acting for the Christians in Crete, might pass without asking leave; but when the Cretan deputies visited the United States ship Franklin, circulating revolutionary addresses, they were returned by order of Admiral Farragut.

Immediately preceding the horrible earthquakes, of which we give a full account on page 617, a strange phenomena occurred in various parts of South and Central America. At Valparaiso a brilliant light was visible in the northeast which was supposed to be a conflagration or a volcanic eruption, though it was argued that it resulted entirely from electric causes. An enormous development of electric fluid filled the atmosphere, and that on passing the hands through one's hair or on shaking one's coat electric sparks were struck off in abundance. In Brazil during the latter part of July a meteor was observed, which disturbed magnetic instruments very greatly, the compass oscillating fifteen degrees from north to west.

The London Times says, in regard to the Alabama claims, that "legal points will not stand in the way" of their settlement, and that "the only thing to ascertain is the responsibility of England, and to fix the proper indemnity."

WRECK OF THE HIPPOCAMPUS.

We illustrate on this page the wreck of the steamer Hippocampus, on Lake Michigan. This steamer was struck by a sudden squall on the morning of September 8, and she went down almost instantly. The details of the disaster have not yet reached us; but it is known that many of the passengers and crew were lost. The survivors who report the loss of the steamer were in the water for two days and part of two nights, and were picked up by a small sailing vessel when nearly exhausted.

BEE HUNTING.

THE accompanying sketches, made during a recent jaunt in the Adirondack region, are illustrative of scenes that one may witness, if so disposed, while camping out in the "Wilderness."

"Max," said one of the ladies of the party to our guide, "there must be quantities of bees in the woods, for they hum and buzz about that maple-sugar of ours until I am really afraid to go near it."

"Fog's right about, do they, Miss Mamie?" "Fogs" is a favorite phrase of Max's, and does duty in all sorts of ways. "Well, them's some of my molasses-makers," he continued; "if you like honey, I'll take up the hive to-morrow, and let you see how we 'line a bee-tree.'"

"Bee hunting," said Max, as we left the shanty the next morning for our hunt, "always reminds me of General GRANT, for, like him, we fights it out on one line till we gets through."

We soon reached our old clearing, when Max produced his little bee-box, from which he took some honey-comb and put it in a little fire which I had quickly kindled as a convenient log.

"You see, girls," said he to the ladies, "the bees scents this from a mile or more away, and comes to see me when I call them so. Then I feeds the little chaps this way," said Max, as he placed some honey in the bottom of the bee-box. During the time that we waited for the arrival of Max's bees, the good fellow entertained us with stories of bear, panther, wolves, lynx, and all manner of things peculiar to the woods.

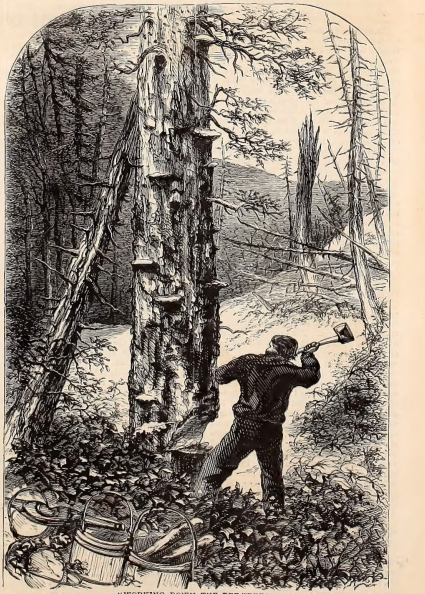
"Max! Max! here they come!" cried one of the "girls," who, in listening to the stories, had not neglected to watch the bee-box.

"Know'd that some time ago," said Max; "only wanted to see whether they were going to get into the box without my help; but I guess they be. We'll watch 'em for a while, then put our mark on a few, to see how far away they live."

The bees had by this time gotten well to work, seeing which, Max took some flour and dropped a little on the backs of two or three of the bees that were busy on the honey. By this time even the ladies had decided the line, for it was easy enough to watch the flight of the bee, from the time that it left the box, circled a few times, then directed its flight in a "bee-line" toward the hive. The marked bees soon returned and re-entered the open box.

"Ain't very far to that hive: wasn't gone long, any how," quoth Max, as he gently shut the box-lid and tapped on the box, to make the bees leave the honey in the bottom and rise to the top, so that he might shove in the little slide that divided the box in the centre, thus separating the bees from the honey. Picking up the box, Max started on the line, the party following after, each endeavoring to assist in locating the line. A quarter of a mile traversed in this way, we were halted by Max setting down the bee-box, drawing out the slide, and covering the box with his hat. (The box has a little glass window in the top.) Peeping in, and discovering that the bees were at work on the honey, he took away the hat and opened the box. In a short time we were again on the line, and in two more "tries" lined the honey-makers to their abode in the great trunk of an ancient birch-tree.

Max's axe now came into use, and as the tree came crushing down we dashed forward and stopped with moss the hole used by the bees as their entrance and exit. Rolls of thin birch-bark were now lighted and held to the hole, from which the plug had been removed.



"Bees don't fight fire much before they gives up and takes the back track for the honey," said Max, when the bees had ceased the useless contest and he was engaged in chopping out the "big chips" that were to reveal the sweets. Soon we were removing the great combs of honey from the tree-trunk hive to the pails that we had brought with us.

On our way back to the shanty Max told how other bees, attracted by the honey, would come, and sometimes great battles would be fought; and the bees whose honey was lost, being weaker, would be defeated, and if their queen was killed would go off with the other bees and make sugar for them, thus starting another bee-tree for future capture.

Nearly a hundred pounds of honey was distributed from our bee-tree, besides the quantity that we consumed ourselves.

BEE HUNTING IN THE ADIRONDACKS.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

WRECK OF THE "SUWANEE."

THE loss of the above-named steamer occurred on the morning of the 9th July, 1868, at 6 o'clock, in Shadwell Passage, Queen Charlotte Sound, British Columbia, while on her passage to Sitka. At the time of the accident she was steaming at the rate of about seven knots, and when nearly abreast of Centre and Galiano islands struck a sunken rock with such force as to knock a hole in her bottom, forward of the wheel. The tide was falling rapidly at the time, and although every exertion was made to save her it was found impossible. The ship began to strain heavily as the tide left her, forcing the stanchions up through her decks, and at about 7 o'clock A.M. she broke in two just forward of the hurricane deck. Finding it impossible to save her, orders were given to save all provisions, stores, etc., necessary, or that could be taken in the boats, and all were safely landed on Hope Island, where a camp was established, tents erected, and all attention bestowed to the comforts of officers and crew. The Indians at that place were found to be very friendly, and aided much in taking light stores on shore in their canoes. At about 1 P.M., having secured all the property then available, the Captain ordered her to be abandoned, and at 2 o'clock P.M. the crew took up their abode on Hope Island, where they continued to "wreck her" as opportunity offered.

The Suwanee was a side-wheel double-ender of 1030 tons register, built in 1864 in Chester, Pennsylvania; her hull was made of ½-inch iron. She was intended for river service during the war, but was shortly ordered to the Pacific, where she remained until the present time. Her armament consisted of two 100-pounder Parrott rifles on pivots, four 9-inch Dahlgren guns, two 24-pounder and two 20-pounder Dahlgren howitzers. The whole length "over all" 254 feet. During the invasion of Mexico by the French she performed some service in favor of American shipping at Mazatlan. The accompanying sketch was made by an officer attached to the Suwanee.

LA MERE BAUCHE.

IN TWO PARTS.

PART I.

THE Pyrenean Valley, in which the bath of Vernet are situated, is not much known to English or indeed to any travelers. Tourists in search of good hotels and picturesque beauty combined do not generally extend their journeys to the Eastern Pyrenees. They rarely get beyond Luchon; and in this they are right, as they thus end their peregrinations at the most lovely spot among these mountains, and are, as a rule, so deceived, imposed on, and bewildered by guides, inn-keepers, and horse-owners at this otherwise delightful place, that they become undesirous of further travel. Nor do invalids from distant parts frequent Vernet. People of fashion go to the Eaux Bonnes and to Luchon, and people who are really ill to Barrèges and Cauterets. It is at these places that one meets crowds of Parisians, and the daughters and wives of rich merchants from Bordeaux, with an admixture now by no means inconsiderable of Englishmen and English women. But the Eastern Pyrenees are still unfrequented.

And probably they will remain so; for though there are among them lovely valleys—and of all such the valley of Vernet is perhaps the most lovely—they can not compete with the mountain scenery of other tourist-loved regions in Europe. At the Port de Venasque and the Brèche de Roland in the Western Pyrenees, or rather, to speak more truly, at spots in the close vicinity of these famous mountain entrances from France into Spain, one can make comparisons with Switzerland, Northern Italy, the Tyrol, and Ireland which will not be injurious to the scenes then under view. But among the Eastern mountains this can rarely be done. The hills do not stand thickly together, so as to group themselves; the passes from one valley to another, though not wanting in altitude, are not close pressed together with overhanging rocks, and are deficient in grandeur as well as loveliness. And then, as a natural consequence of all this, the hotels are not quite as good as they should be.

But there is one mountain among them which can claim to rank with the Pïda Midi or the Maledetta. No one can pooh-pooh the stern old Canigou, standing high and solitary, solemn and grand, between the two roads which run from Perpignan into Spain, the one by Prades, and the other by Le Boulon. Under the Canigou, toward the west, lie the hot baths of Vernet, in a close, secluded valley, which, as I have said before, is, as far as I know, the sweetest spot in these Eastern Pyrenees.

The frequenters of these baths were, a few years back, gathered almost entirely from towns not very far distant, from Perpignan, Narbonne, Carcassonne, and Beziéres, and were not therefore famous, expensive, or luxurious. But those who believed in them believed with great faith; and it was certainly the fact that men and women who went thither worn with toil, sick with excesses, and nervous through overcare, came back fresh and strong, fit once more to attack the world with its ills woes. Their character in latter days does not seem to have changed, though their circle of admirers may perhaps be somewhat extended.

In those days by far the most noted and illustrious person in the village of Vernet was La Mère Bauche. That there had been once a Père Bauche was known to the world, for there was a fils Bauche, who lived with his mother, but no one seemed to remember more of him than that he had once existed. At Vernet he had never been known. La Mère Bauche was a native of the village, but her married life had been passed away from it, and she had returned in her early widowhood to become proprietress and manager, or, as one may say, the heart and soul of the Hôtel Bauche at Vernet.

This hotel was a large and somewhat rough establishment, intended for the accommodation of invalids who came to Vernet for their health. It was built immediately over one of the thermal springs, so that the water flowed from the bowels of the earth directly into the baths. There was accommodation for seventy people; and during the summer and autumn months the place was always full. Not a few also were to be found there during the winter and spring, for the charges of Madame Bauche were low, and the accommodation reasonably good.

And in this respect, as indeed in all others, Madame Bauche had the reputation of being an honest woman. She had a certain price from which no earthly consideration would induce her to depart; and certain returns for this price, in the shape of "déjeuners" and "dîners," baths and beds, which she never failed to give in accordance with the dictates of a strict conscience. These were traits in the character of a hotel-keeper which can not be praised too highly, and which had met their due reward in the custom of the public. But, nevertheless, there were those who thought that there was occasionally ground for complaint in the conduct even of Madame Bauche.

In the first place, she was deficient in that pleasant smiling softness which should belong to any keeper of a house of public entertainment. In her general mode of life she was stern and silent with her guests; she was autocratic, authoritative, and sometimes contradictory in her house, and altogether irrational and unconciliatory when any change, even for a day, was proposed to her, or when any shadow of a complaint reached her ears.

Indeed of complaint, as made against the establishment, she was altogether intolerant. To such she had but one answer. He or she who complained might leave the place at a moment's notice if it so pleased them. There were always others ready to take their places. The power of making this answer came to her from the lowness of her prices, and it was a power which was very dear to her.

The baths were taken at different hours according to medical advice; but the usual time was from five to seven in the morning. The déjeuner, or early meal, was at nine o'clock, the dinner was at four. After that, no eating or drinking was allowed in the Hôtel Bauche. There was a café in the village at which ladies and gentlemen could get a cup of coffee or a glass of eau sucrée; but no such accommodation was to be had in the establishment. Nor by any possible bribery or persuasion could any meal be procured at any other than the authorized hours. A visitor who should enter the salon à manger more than ten minutes after the last bell would be looked at very sourly by Madame Bauche, who on all occasions sat at the top of her own table. Should any one appear as much as half an hour late he would receive only his share of what had not then been handed round. But after the last dish had been so handed it was utterly useless for any one to enter the room at all.

Her appearance at the period of our tale was perhaps not altogether in her favor. She was then about sixty years of age, and was very stout and short in the neck. She wore her own gray hair, which at dinner was always tidy enough; but during the whole day previous to that hour she might be seen with it escaping from under her cap in extreme disorder. Her eyebrows were large and bushy, but these alone would not have given to her face that look of indomitable sternness which it possessed. Her eyebrows were serious in their effect, but not so serious as the pair of green spectacles which she always wore under them. It was thought by those who had analyzed the subject that the great secret of Madame Bauche's power lay in her green spectacles.

Her custom was to move about and through the whole establishment every day from breakfast till the period came for her to dress for dinner. She would visit every chamber and every bath, walk once or twice round the salle à manger, and very repeatedly round the kitchen; she would go into every nook and corner, and peer into every thing through her green spectacles. And in these walks it was not always thought pleasant to meet her. Her custom was to move very slowly, with her hands generally clasped behind her back; she rarely spoke to the guests unless she was spoken to, and on such occasions she would seek to diverge into general conversation. If any one had aught to say connected with the business of the establishment she would listen; and then she would make her answer, often not pleasant in the hearing.

And thus she walked her path through the world, a stern, hard, solemn old woman, not without gusts of passionate explosion; but honest withal, and also not without some inward benevolence and true tenderness of heart. Children she had had many, some seven or eight. One or two had died; others had been married. She had sons settled far away from home, and at the time of which we are now speaking but one was left in any sense subject to parental authority.

Adolphe Bauche was the only one of her children of whom much was remembered by the present denizens and hangers-on of the hotel. He was the youngest of the number, and had been born only very shortly before the return of Madame Bauche to Vernet had been definitely reared at the hotel. It was thought by the world of those parts, and rightly thought, that he was his mother's favorite more so than had been any of his brothers and sisters—the very apple of her eye and gem of her life. At this time he was about twenty-five years of age, and for the last two years had been absent from Vernet—for reasons which will shortly be made to appear. He had been sent to Paris to see something of the world, and learn to talk French instead of the patois of his valley, and having left Paris had come down into Auvergne, Languedoc, and manner there picking up some agricultural lore which it was thought might prove useful in the valley farms of Vernet. He was now expected home again, very speedily, much to his mother's delight.

That she was kind and gracious to her favorite child does not perhaps give much proof of her benevolence, but she had also been kind and gracious to the child of a neighbor; or, rather, to the orphan child of a rival inn-keeper. At Vernet there had been more than one water establishment, but the owner of the second had for some few years after Madame Bauche had settled herself at the place. His house had not thriven, and he had died, a little girl, was left altogether without provision.

This little girl, Marie Clavert, La Mère Bauche had taken into her own house immediately on the father's death, although she had most cordially hated that father. Marie was then an infant, and Madame Bauche had accepted the charge without much thought, perhaps, as to what might be the child's ultimate destiny. But since then she had come to be of a mother by the little girl, who had become the pet of the whole establishment, the favorite plaything of Adolphe Bauche, and at last, of course, his early sweetheart.

And then and therefore she had come troubles at Vernet. Of course all the world in the valley had seen what was taking place, and what was likely to take place, long before Madame Bauche knew any thing about it. But it had to broken upon her senses that her son, Adolphe Bauche, the heir to all her virtues and all her riches, the first young man in that or any neighboring valley, was absolutely contemplating the idea of marrying that poor little orphan, Marie Clavert.

That any one should ever fall in love with Marie Clavert had never occurred to Madame Bauche. She had always regarded the child as a child, as the object of her charity, and as a little thing to be petted when she pay not Marie by all the world. She, looking through her green spectacles, had never seen that Marie Clavert was a beautiful creature, possessing many charms, such as young men love to look on. Marie was of infinite duty use to Madame Bauche in a hundred little things about the house, and was gradually thoroughly recognized and appreciated her utility. But for this very reason she had never thought how much Marie otherwise might be a useful drudge. She was very fond of her protégée—so much so that she would listen to her in affairs of trouble, and now when she would listen to no one else; but Marie's prettiness, and grace, and sweetness as a girl, had all been thrown away upon Madame Bauche, as might have been said of Adolphe.

But, unluckily, it had not been thrown away upon Adolphe. He had appreciated, as it was natural that he should do, all that had been so utterly indifferent to his mother, and consequently had fallen in love—consequently, also, he had told his love; and consequently, also, had been returned his love. Adolphe had been hitherto constrained to do many things, and thought that all difficulty would be prevented by his informing his mother that he wished to marry Marie. But Marie, with a woman's instinct, had known better. She had trembled and almost crouched with fear when she confessed her love, and had absolutely hid herself from sight when Adolphe went forth, prepared to ask his mother's consent to his marriage.

The indignation and passionate wrath of Madame Bauche were passed and gone two years before the date of this story, and I need not therefore much enlarge upon that subject. She was at first abusive and bitter, which was very bad for Marie; and afterward bitter and silent, which was worse. It was of course determined that poor Marie should be sent away to some asylum for orphans or penniless paupers; in short, anywhere out of the way. What mattered her outlook into the world, her happiness, or, indeed, her very existence? The outlook and happiness of Adolphe Bauche—was not that to be considered as every thing at Vernet?

But this terribly sharp aspect of affairs did not last long. In the first place, Adolphe Bauche had, under those green spectacles, a heart that in truth was tender and affectionate. After the first two days of anger she understood that something must be done for Marie Clavert, and after the fourth day she acknowledged that the world of the hotel, her world, would not go on well without Marie Clavert as it would with her. And in the next place, Madame Bauche had a friend whose advice in grave matters she would sometimes take. This friend had told her that it would be much better to send away Adolphe, and that this was necessary that there should be a sending away of some one; that he would be much benefited by passing some months of his life away from his native valley; that an absence of a year or two would teach him to forget Marie, even if it did not teach Marie to forget him.

And we must say a word or two about this friend. At Vernet he was usually called M. Le Capitaine, though, in fact, he had never reached that rank. He had been in the army, and having been wounded in the leg while still a soubaltern, and having been promoted, he had been interdicted from treading any farther the thorny path which leads to glory. For the last fifteen years he had been residing at Vernet with Madame Bauche, at first as a casual visitor, going and coming, but now for many years as a constant inmate of the establishment.

He was so constantly called Le Capitaine that his real name was seldom heard. It may, however, as well be known to the reader that he Theodore Campan. He was a tall, well-looking man, always dressed in black garments, of a coarse description indeed, but yet always clean and well brushed; of, perhaps, fifty years of age, and conspicuous for the rigid uprightness of his back —and for a black wooden leg.

This wooden leg was, perhaps, the most remarkable fact in his character. It was always jet black, being painted or perhaps varnished, as occasion might require, by the hands of the Capitaine himself. It was longer than ordinary wooden legs, as indeed the Capitaine was longer than ordinary men; but, nevertheless, it never seemed in any way to impede the rigid punctilious propriety of his movements. It was never in his way as wooden legs usually are in the way of their wearers, but then to render it more illustrious it had round its middle, about the calf of the leg, if we may so say, a band of bright brass which shone like polished gold.

It had been the Capitaine's custom, now for some years past, to recive every evening at about seven o'clock in the drawing-room-sanctorum of Madame Bauche's habitation, the single glass of vute sitting-room in which she made out her bills and calculated her profits. Here he regale himself in her presence—and, indeed, at her expense, for the items never appeared in the bill—with coffee and cognac. It was said that there was neither eating nor drinking at the establishment after the regular dinner-hour; but in so saying I spoke of the world at large. Nothing further was allowed in the way of trade; but in the way of friendship so much was nowadays always expected to do by Madame.

It was at these moments that Madame Bauche discussed her private affairs, and asked for and received advice. In the matter of Adolphe she was mortal; nor could her green spectacles without other and carry her through all the troubles of life. It was very true that the whole world of Vernet had discovered that La Mère Bauche was going to marry the Capitaine, and for eighteen months the world of Vernet had talked of this matter; but any amount of patience is at last exhausted; and as no farther steps in that direction were ever taken than the daily cup of coffee, that subject died away—very much undecided by La Mère Bauche.

But she, though of the height of no matrimony for herself, thought much of matrimony for other people; and over most of these cups of evening coffee and cognac a matrimonial subject was discussed in those latter days. It has been seen that the Capitaine pleaded in Marie's favor when the fury of Madame Bauche first burst forth; and that ultimately Marie was kept at home, and Adolphe sent away by his advice.

"But Adolphe will not stay away," Madame Bauche had pleaded in her difficulty. "The truth of the matter is, Capitaine, that he is not Marie, he said, 'will be dead to each one else before two years were over. And so the matter had been determined.

But to whom should she be married? To this question the Capitaine had answered, in perfect innocence of heart, that La Mère Bauche would be much better off, and able to make a choice herself. He did not know how Marie might stand with regard to money. If Madame would give some little "dot," the affair, the Capitaine thought, would be more easily arranged.

All these things took months to say, during which poor Marie was left to eat her heart in melancholy listlessness. One comfort she had. Adolphe, before he went, had sworn to her, holding in his hand as he did so a little cross which she had given him, that no earthly consideration should ever cause them—that sooner or later he would certainly be her husband. Marie felt that her limbs could not work nor her tongue speak, were it not for this one drop of water in her cup.

And then, deeply meditating, La Mère Bauche hit upon a plan, and herself communicated to the Capitaine over a second cup of coffee which she poured a full tea-spoonful more than the usual allowance of cognac. Why should not he, the Capitaine himself, be induced to marry Marie Clavert?

It was a very startling proposal, the idea of matrimony for himself never having as yet entered into the Capitaine's head at any period of his life; but La Mère Bauche did contrive to make it not altogether unacceptable. As to that matter of dowry she was prepared to be more than generous. She did love Marie well, and could find it in her heart to give her any thing in reason—any thing except her son, her own Adolphe. That was proposed was this: Adolphe himself would never have to be bathe. If the Capitaine would take Marie for his wife, Marie, Madame Bauche would bestow upon her the mistress after her death—subject, of course, to certain settlements as to Adolphe's pecuniary interests.

The plan was discussed on several occasions, and at last so far brought to bear that Marie was made acquainted with it, having been called in to sit in presence with La Mère Bauche and her future proposed husband. The poor girl manifested no disgust to the stiff, ungainly lover whom they assigned to her, who, through his whole frame, was in appearance almost as wooden as his own leg. On the whole, indeed, Marie liked the Capitaine, and felt that he was her friend, and in her country such marriages were not uncommon. The Capitaine was, perhaps, a little old for a husband, but then a man might undoubtedly be thought justified in demanding the services of a young girl as his nurse and wife; but then Marie was not thinking of this—except her youth, and beauty, and goodness.

But yet she could not consent, for was she not betrothed to Adolphe? Was not his oath given? And, therefore, when the great pecuniary advantages were one by one displayed before her, and when La Mère Bauche at a last argument, performed her that as the wife of the Capitaine she would be regarded as a second mistress in the establishment—and not as a servant, she could only burst out into tears and say that she did not know.

"I will be very kind to you," said the Capitaine; "as kind as a man can be."

Marie took his hard, withered hand and kissed it, and then sat down with her face with bowed eyes which were not without avail upon his heart.

"We will not press her now," said the Capitaine. "There is time enough."

But let his heart be touched ever so much, one thing was certain, that it was not his potential that she should marry Adolphe. To that matter of the matter he had given in his unrestricted adhesion, and he knew by any means withdraw it without losing altogether his position in the establishment of Madame Bauche. Nor, indeed, did his conscience prompt him to such a marriage should he permitted. That would be too much. If every pretty girl were to be allowed to marry the first young man who might fall in love with her what would the world come to?

And it soon appeared that there was not time enough—three years—in which to carry out a scheme. In three months Adolphe would be back; and if every thing was not arranged by that time matters might be very awkward.

And then Madame Bauche asked her final question—"You do not think, do you, that you can ever marry Adolphe?" and as she asked it, the accustomed terror of her poor speeches magnified itself tenfold. Marie could only answer by another burst of tears.

The affair was at last settled among them. Marie said that she would consent to marry the Capitaine when she was assured from Adolphe's own mouth that he, Adolphe, loved her no longer. She declared with many tears that her vows and pledges pertained to the promising more than to this. It was not her fault, at any rate not now, that she loved her lover. It was not her fault, and now, at least, she would be bound by those pledges. When she heard from his own mouth that he had discarded her, then she would marry the Capitaine. She would sacrifice herself in no other way that La Mère Bauche might desire. What would any thing signify then?

Madame Bauche's countenance remained unmoved, but not her heart. Marie, she told the Capitaine, should be equal to herself in the establishment. Marie, she was entitled to be called Madame Campan; and she should be to her quite as a daughter. She should have her day of coffee and cognac, and dine at the table d'hôte, and wear a silk gown at church; and the servants should all call her Madame. A great favor should be done her, if she would only give up her foolish, girlish, childish love for Adolphe. And all these great promises were repeated to Marie by the Capitaine.

But, nevertheless, there was only one thing in the whole world which in Marie's eyes was of any value, and that thing was the love of her Adolphe Bauche. Without that she would be nothing—with that, with that assured, she could wait patiently till deserted.

Letters were written to Adolphe during all these confabulations; and a letter came from him, saying that he had greatly valued Marie's love, but that as it had been clearly proved to him that there would not be neither for her advantage nor for his, he was willing to give it up. He consented to her marriage with the Capitaine, and remained, in gratitude to his mother for the immediate pecuniary advantages which she had held out to him. Oh, Adolphe, Adolphe! But, alas, alas! is not such the way of men's hearts—and of the hearts of women?

This letter was read to Marie, but it had no more effect upon her than would have had some dry legal document. In those days and in those places men and women did not depend upon letters for their love, and then they were always there expressed in them much of heart or of feeling. Marie would understand, as she was well aware, the glance of Adolphe's eye, the tone of Adolphe's voice; she would perceive at once what her lover really meant, what he wished, what in the innermost corner of his heart he really desired that she should do. But from that stiff, constrained written document she could understand nothing.

It was agreed, therefore, that Adolphe should return, and that he would arrive at the first fete in his mouth. The Capitaine, who knew more of human nature than did poor Marie, felt tolerably secure of his success. Adolphe, who had seen something of the world, would not now care very much for the girl of his own valley. Money, and pleasure, and some little position in the world, would soon wean him from his love; and then Marie would accept her destiny—as other girls in the same position had done since the French world began.

DONELSON,*

GRANT'S FIRST VICTORY.

ONE evening late in December (1861), Generals Halleck, Sherman, and Cullum were conversing together at the Planters' Hotel, in St. Louis, on the proper line of invasion. They saw clearly that the Confederates meant to stand on the Mississippi, and Halleck asked, "Where is their line?" Sherman replied, "Why, from Bowling Green to Columbus." "Well, then, where is the true point of attack?" "Naturally the centre." "Then let us see what is the direction in which it should be made."

A map lay on the table, and, with a blue pencil, Halleck drew a line from Bowling Green to Columbus, past Donelson and Henry, and southward through Corinth to its centre, which proved to coincide nearly with the Tennessee River. "There," said he, "that is the true line of attack."

This forcing of the Confederate line would bring the important states Kentucky and, tennessee into the national control. It would make in reverse the strong works on the Mississippi, which could not be reduced by a mere naval attack. Finally, upon that great river, it would permit the passage of a national army into the recesses of the Cotton States, and expose Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, even Virginia, to attack on an unprotected flank.

In determining the mode in which this movement should be carried into execution, it was evident that the essential point was the seizure of the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers. This would lead directly to the fall of the two forts Henry and Donelson, on which the Confederates were relying for the protection of those rivers.

The Confederate line of defence had been intrusted to General Albert Sydney Johnston. He was at Bowling Green, confronting General Buell. The fortified post of Columbus, on which the left flank of the Confederates rested, was considered by them to be the Gibraltar of America. They believed their army could close the Mississippi until their independence was acknowledged. It was in charge of General Polk. The strength of the entire force holding the line was about 60,000 men.

To overcome the proposed operation two national armies were available. One was at Cairo, under General Grant. There was with it a naval force, having seven iron-clad gun-boats under Commodore Foote. The other army was at Louisville. It was under command of General Buell, and was 60,000 strong.

It had been intended originally that Grant's force should operate directly on the Mississippi River, from Cairo, and that Buell's army should strike at the intrenched camp at Bowling Green. If the force there were disposed of, Nashville, in its rear, must necessarily be abandoned.

In Halleck's view, the operation on the line of the Tennessee River would accomplish all these results. If the army and the gun-boats could force their way up that stream, Columbus and Bowling Green would be turned, strong they might be, must both at once fall, and Nashville must share their fate.

Fort Henry, on the East bank of the Tennessee, and Fort Donelson, on the west bank of the Cumberland, were bastioned earth-works, twelve hundred yards apart, and, as was completely after the issue of the President's war order (January 27th, 1862) commanding a general movement, were under the immediate command of Fort Henry.* Of the fleet of gun-boats employed, four were iron-clad and three wooden. They were under Commodore Foote. The iron-clad force was under General Grant. The garrison of the fort, commanded by General Tilghman, was 2734 strong: the artillery consisted of seventeen guns.

Halleck gave the necessary orders for the expedition on the 30th of January, and Grant left Cairo with 15,000 men. The Confederates had works on both sides of the river, Fort Henry being on the east bank and Fort Heiman on the west, the latter commanding the former. The country was all under water, the river overflowing, the rain still falling in torrents. Though Tilghman was receiving re-enforcements and hastening the completion of his works, he found that he must withdraw from Fort Heiman and defend Fort Henry alone.

It was understood between Foote and Grant that the former was to reduce the fort, the latter to cut off the retreat of the garrison. The attack was to begin at twelve o'clock (February 6th). Foote thought he could reduce the work in an hour, and Grant, whose forces were three miles below, allowed himself two hours to accomplish his march. The gun-boats commenced their fire at a thousand yards, approaching gradually within six hundred.

* Extract from Vol. II. of DR. DRAPER'S History of the American Civil War, published by HARPER & BROTHERS.

Tilghman returned the fire at first very vigorously, but a series of accidents in succession befell him—a rifled 24-pounder burst, killing and wounding a number of his men; a premature discharge of a 42-pounder killed three of its gunners. From the beginning he had foreseen that he could not hold the place. In his report he says, "My object was to save the main body by delaying matters as long as possible. I therefore ordered Colonel Heiman to join the command and keep up the retreat in good order, while I would fight the guns as long as one was left, and sacrifice myself to save the main body of my troops." He had given orders for the garrison to retire to Fort Donelson before the firing began, and the loaded gun of the guns himself. At the end of little more than an hour, he, with his staff and sixty men, crossed unembarrassed to Fort Donelson. His loss in killed and wounded was twenty-one.

As the land-forces under Grant had been delayed by the flood in the roads longer than had been anticipated, the Confederate garrison under Heiman made their escape safely. Another incident of the chief cavalry occurred on board the iron-clad Essex, which received a shot in her boiler, in consequence of which twenty-nine other cars and men were disabled.

The conduct of General Tilghman in this affair stands in very striking contrast with that of Floyd and Pillow at Donelson. For the sake of giving time for his garrison to make good its escape, he continued his hopeless resistance, and was the last to lower his banner along with his artillerists.

For fifteen days succeed, General Halleck next turned his attention to Fort Donelson. Fresh reinforcements were therefore rapidly brought from Halleck's army, and also from St. Louis, Cairo, Cincinnati, and Paducah.

The Tennessee and Cumberland, as they approach the Ohio, run northward and nearly parallel to each other. Fort Donelson was about forty miles above the mouth of the Cumberland, and on its west bank. It was a large field-work of a hundred acres, near the town of the same, on a bluff rising by a gentle slope from the river, at the point where the stream turns from its westerly course. The height of the bluff was about 100 feet. The strength of the work was directed toward the river, which it effectually commanded; on the land side it was comparatively weak. The entire artillery, including light batteries, were 65 pieces. The eventual strength of the garrison was 21,000. The surrounding country was rugged, hilly, and heavily wooded. Round the works timber had been felled, and small trees half chopped and bent round on abatis, which flooded by the rains, formed defenses on the right and left.

As soon as it became clear that the fort was about to be attacked from the land side, the Confederate commanders exerted themselves to strengthen it. It is rectified line two miles and a half in length, inclosing the town of Dover, was drawn along the commanding high grounds. Re-enforcements were sent from Bowling Green by the railroad, and the work pushed on day and night. The garrison of Fort Henry came in on the 7th, the command of Pillow arrived on the 10th, that of Buckner on the 11th, that of Floyd on the 12th. Floyd, as the senior officer, was in command.

Grant moved from Fort Henry upon Donelson, with about 15,000 men, on Wednesday, the 12th. He had been delayed to unload his supplies to give time for preparing the gun-boats, though every hour of it was strengthening the enemy. His forces arrived by the 13th, and encamped on the others by the Dover Road. He was before the fort in the afternoon of that day, and spent the remaining daylight in bringing his troops into position. Batteries were posted and the movement completed in the night. It was his intention, if the gun-boats should arrive, to make an attack next morning. His force consisted of the division of McClernand, containing the four brigades of Oglesby, W. H. L. Wallace, McArthur, Morrison; the division of C. F. Smith, containing the three brigades of Cook, Lauman, and M. L. Smith. The division of Lew. Wallace did not arrive until the 14th. Smith's division was to be on the left, Lew. Wallace's on the centre, McClernand's on the right. He formed his first line opposite the enemy's centre, his left resting on Hickman Creek, his right extending not quite across to Dover. The advance was very difficult on account of a growth of dwarf oaks.

Though the gun-boats had not arrived, a cannonade was opened. McClernand made an attack on a battery commanding the left road on which Grant lay. He met with a repulse in his attempt to carry it. There was a long storm of hail and snow after dark, and the troops were ordered to fall back. They had no tents and no fires; many of them were without blankets. The cries of the wounded calling for water were heard all night long.

At midnight six gun-boats and fourteen transports had arrived; the latter bringing Lew. Wallace's division, and giving Grant a superiority of force. Up to this time he had not been as strong as the Confederates. It was, therefore, not to have been anticipated to get these troops into position, and the consequence was that the attack on Pillow had to be necessarily carried on by the boats.

Of the gun-boats four were iron-clad, the remaining two wooden. The former opened their fire and advanced until they were within three hundred yards of the Confederate batteries, which, up to this time silent, were now vigorously worked. Their plunging fire, for they were elevated about thirty feet, soon told heavily on the boats. For an hour and a half the contest was maintained, when the steering apparatus of two was disabled, and they drifted down the stream. The others were compelled to withdraw. They had a loss of 54 killed and wounded; among the latter was Commodore Foote. In the Confederate batteries no one was killed, and the works were uninjured.

Thus the attack from the river, as well as McClernand's partial attempt from the land side, had failed, and apparently it had become necessary for the national commanders to have recourse to entrenchments.

But Floyd had taken alarm. He had seen that heavy re-enforcements, Lew. Wallace's division, had that day arrived, he considered that, notwithstanding his success in beating off the gun-boats, there was no place within his entrenchments that could not be reached by the enemies artillery fire from their batteries and their batteries, and that there was no way to prevent them from passing a column above him on the river, and thus cutting off his communications with Nashville, unless he could counterbalance the possibility of egress. He therefore summoned a council that evening, at which he determined to abandon the fort, force a way past Grant's right, and escape to Nashville.

At that time, owing to the high water of the river, there was but one practicable road—Wynn's Ferry Road. Between it and the river lay the division of McClernand, the national right wing. The Confederate general, therefore, was to throw their left, Pillow's division, against the national right flank, McClernand's, and, with Buckner's division in reserve, fight their way, and leaving there only a weak force, to attack the right of the national centre, which was upon Wynn's Ferry Road. Having thus forced back the national right upon the centre, and Buckner take the disordered mass in flank, it was expected that in the confusion he could break on the left—McClernand upon Wallace, and both upon Smith—and that the Wynn's Ferry Road would be opened.

On Wednesday night the air had been warm and genial; the sky was cloudless; the moon at full. On the night of the 14th the weather changed; there was a storm of sleet and snow. On Friday night it was reported by the Confederate engineer officer to be 10° Fahrenheit. Nevertheless, the Confederates got ready to execute their desperate undertaking on Saturday morning at five o'clock—an hour before day.

At first fortune favored the boldly conceived and bravely executed attempt. Buckner's troops had left ground from their position the two national right brigades. Meantime Buckner, who had brought his troops over from the centre on the right, mounted the third right national brigade, at first ineffectually, but at length, stimulated by Floyd's words, successfully. Nevertheless, McClernand's troops did not retreat until their ammunition was exhausted. "At nine o'clock Grant's right wing had been completely pressed from its ground and the Wynn's Ferry Road opened. The Confederates might now have escaped.

All this occurred during the absence of Grant. He had gone on board a gun-boat at 2 A. M. to consult with Commodore Foote, who had been wounded, and had asked for this consultation. Already Lew. Wallace, who was holding Grant's centre, had come on the field, and on the assistance of the defeated right wing, but with no other result than to participate in their disaster. With his remaining troops Grant had now presented a firm front at right angles to his former one, and behind this the defeated troops of the right wing rallied and reformed.

Against this the Confederates, flushed with success, but not altogether without confusion, advanced. They were encountered by a fire that they instantly broke, and, on making a second attempt, broke again. This time they could not be rallied.

Grant had now come on the field. It was about nine o'clock. Though the battle had failed, everything was in confusion. The troops were scattered in knots. At a glance he appreciated the disaster and took his resolve. "On this point the battle was lost. The troops were ready to give way if the other showed a bold front. I took the opportunity, and ordered an advance of the whole line." The left wing, left wing, was to storm the enemy's works in his front, Wallace to recover the ground that had been lost, Smith to attack on the right, and the gun-boats to make a vigorous demonstration.

The removal of Buckner from Smith's front for the early attack in the morning had greatly weakened the right of the Confederate line. Buckner, however, was not aware of this fact, as it was too late. The storming column, with Smith at its head, was steadily and irresistibly advancing. It forced him back at all points. As Buckner's troops came on, they encountered such a fire as had them out of the way. The enemy's right was broken, and the road to Nashville was open; the Confederates fled into the work. Smith had gained possession of the high ground from which the enemy's guns fired. The defenses of Donelson might be enfiladed.

Buckner's withdrawal from the ground that had been occupied by his troops had never been ordered and demoralized the Confederate left. At this instant Wallace made his attack on that front. It was impossible to resist him. The Confederates here also recoiled to their own works. The opportunity they had seen at one moment was lost. Not only was the line of investment renewed, but the fort had become untenable: had daylight lasted half an hour longer it would have been taken. The losses on each side amounted to about two thousand killed and wounded.

Darkness fell upon Donelson. The cold was more than twenty degrees below the freezing point. The woods were covered with a sleety incrustation of ice; they swayed and crackled in the night air. Grant fell asleep in a negro hut, Smith on the hard-frozen ground. On the Confederate side there lay the wounded, among many of them dead, many freezing to death. Wallace, whose troops were nearest the scene of agony, employed his men until "far in the morning in ministering to our own wounded," but we did not forget those of the enemy." Jailcous would for water was heard in all directions, for the cannon were now silent. It smote on the ears of Floyd. The arms that he had scattered all over the South had been used!

He called a council of war at Pillow's headquarters. It was concluded that any attempt to renew the sortie would be absolutely disastrous. Buckner declared that he could not hold his position, that he could not offer daylight. In his opinion there was no escape from a surrender.

"There is nothing for us but to capitulate," exclaimed Floyd; "there is no other resource—I can not surrender. You know the position in which I stand." He asked advice of his military inmates, some of whom did not hesitate to express very plainly disapprobation of his intention of escaping from the fort. Buckner, thinking it dishonorable to share the fate of the men, said, "You must judge for yourself." "Gentlemen," said Floyd, "if we put you in command, will you let me take away my brigade?"

Floyd now turned the command over to Pillow, who turned it over to Buckner. Pillow then crossed the river in a scow. Floyd escaped with his Virginia brigade. By the light of lanterns they were all seen to embark at the wharf, many of the men half tipsy staggering under their knapsacks; all shivering with the cold. A few were also seen to escape in the flight-boats. But in this her hour of dire humiliation Virginia was not without soldiers who vindicated her honor. Two regiments refused to abandon the fort, and, with such a shameful example, who chose to remain and share the fate of Buckner and his men.

At daylight Grant was ready to make the assault. He had now 27,000 men, but only eight light batteries of artillery. A white flag was seen on Buckner's fort. It was received from Buckner, to which Grant at once replied—

"SIR,—Yours of this date, proposing an armistice and appointment of commissioners to settle terms of capitulation, is just received. No terms other than an unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted. I propose to move immediately on your works. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, U. S. GRANT.

To this Buckner replied:—

"SIR,—The disinclination of the forces under my command, incident to an unexpected change of commanders, and the overwhelming force under your command, compel me, notwithstanding the brilliant success of the Confederate arms this day, to accept the ungenerous and unchivalrous terms which you propose. I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,

"S. B. BUCKNER."

Hereupon Grant made over to Buckner his "ungenerous and unchivalrous" terms. It was subsequently consented that the officers should keep their side-arms, and both officers and men their personal baggage. It was desired by Buckner that Grant might have the appearance of inflicting humiliation.

Nearly 15,000 prisoners, 17,600 small-arms, and 48 guns were taken. That such was the number of prisoners was shown by the fact that rations were issued at Donelson to 14,623. Grant's losses were 391, of whom 425 were killed.

In his congratulatory order to his troops, Grant tells them that "Fort Donelson, with its armament and stores, and the most inclement weather known in this latitude, they had faced an enemy in large force in a position chosen by himself, and had compelled him to surrender with out conditions, the victory achieved being not only great in itself, but one that will have a bearing on the rebellion, but also in this, that it had secured the greatest number of prisoners of war ever taken in any battle on this continent."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

On a warm September day, watching in luxurious idleness the white rolling surf from the bluff at Long Branch, or strolling slowly along the sandy beach, with the sea-breeze blowing spray, or, perchance, dipping in the exhilarating waves, one can but wonder why the Summer should not present a close which days are becoming more enjoyable, and the fascination of the sea more irresistible. Autumn, which in turn is an imperative mistress, and her votaries obey whether she says "go" or "return." Bona, however, is the only one who is making a flying visit to Long Branch, were sensible enough to wait until the "height of the season" was over, and some things, by the way—such as the privilege of sleeping on a couple of chairs in a hot room, for instance—had ceased to be plenty of room, plenty of attendance, plenty to eat. Waiters become somewhat civil when the season is drawing to a close, and you can take a drive without spending a fortune: a mockery of quiet and repose, a pleasant spot to sit at night will only be noise of the "breaking waves" in your ears. "In the midst of life we are dead" is the motto by far the best of it.

According to the estimate of the clerk of the Stetson House, at the time of this writing (the second week in September), the hotel has entertained about 1,000 persons during the season. Whether accurate reckoning will make the sum total more or less, remains to be seen when the season is actually over. But undoubtedly the rush to Long Branch has never been so great as during the present summer. The situation is picturesque as well known; the magnificent surf-bathing beach, the extended "beach drives," the fine sailing grounds, the pleasant breezes, the good hotels. In every direction, away from the beach as well as along the ocean-front, are villas, villas. The grounds of "Hollywood House," though belonging to a private gentleman, are always open to the public. They embrace 32 acres and contain nearly three miles of walks and drives. Fountains, statuary, and a profusion of rare evergreens is beautifully laid out.

A drive of about two miles from Long Branch village brings one to Monmouth Park. The cemetery at this place possesses a sad interest—here lie the remains of the gallant Lieutenant Cushing, whose name will always be a sea-breeze to the surf beautiful—a furious storm have visited this coast, causing frightful disasters. The Government has established Life-Saving Stations along the coast for the aid of storm-driven vessels. One of these Stations is located near Great Pond, a little more than three miles from the Stetson House. On Thursday, 10th ult., some may remember—the ship New Era ran aground about three miles from here by the mouth of Great Pond. The half four hundred German emigrants on board, and when first seen a heavy sea and violent east wind prevailed. Yet even the boisterous storm could not drown the cries of the wretched creatures for help. Every effort was made; but not until the winds abated the next day could any be saved; then about 30 were rescued in a single hour, when the tide was favorable to the exertions put forth. Others were saved on the third day; but the beach was strewn with dead bodies, and 189 were buried in the cemetery at Mechanicsville, of which we have spoken.

But turning from this sad incident, we look out to the restless but ever beautiful sea, wondering that it could ever prove so treacherous. The sun is nearing the horizon, and the beach is dotted with gay promenaders. Children are digging in the clam, white sand, and gathering shells and pebbles. Sea-birds skim along the fan-crested waves, and there is an intelligent water-dog challenges our applause. With a most exact and comprehensive eye he selects a large edge, and dashes impetuously into the waves in the inspiriting but useless chase. For the dog won't bring the bottle back to you. He may "will engage," but the murmuring sea is soothing—a decisive lounging influence. Then you lie down on the beach, and the "inner man" requires attention you may find yourself still musing, with face turned seaward, when the full-orbed moon rises over the waters. All this see; but a week or two hence, and the scene will be changed. Bathing-houses will be in ocean-view, with its beach, bluff, and, drive, will remain—but "the season is over."

The rules adopted by the Metropolitan Board of Health for enumerating the dead are discovered unnecessarily formidable. A man threw himself into the river at Bridge Street Ferry, and when, after a long search, he was recovered, he was pronounced beyond lifeless. After half an hour of persistent application of the means recommended he returned home. The man began to breathe.

The Commissioners of Charities and Correction have labored continuously for an industrial school for vicious children who are too old to be sent to Randall's Island, and too young to be sent to the Penitentiary, House or House of Reformation.

During the last fifteen years the Children's Aid Society has been successful in conveying places to 14,870 children to the West, and furnishing them with homes. They are taken from the lowest haunts of vice and crime, and placed in respectable situations. Thirteen clubs will pay for the expense of rescuing a child to the West.

It has been proved by experiment that the entire diseases in some of the country fowls, have been recovered under the immediate observation of the Commissioners of Agriculture, at Albany, N. Y. From their official report we clip a paragraph which gives the history of the fowls by which the fatal disease may be distinguished: "The fowls in a deep or high-colored greenish yellow appearance, and the eye the blue appearance of health. The heart is of a brownish mahogany color, and on being cut into has a peculiar watery appearance. The muscular and vascular muscles have the natural pink-red tint, but the deep-seated muscles, and especially the pectoral muscles (those between the ribs), have the dark brown color and nauseous smell. The liver is also of a dark color, in an advanced and perfect disfluctuant, which not only destroys the odor, but kills the virus of the disease."

A wedding in Milwaukee has created quite a sensation—the bride being eighty-eight years of age, and the bridegroom eighty-five. The lady was a widow and wealthy. She was not on good terms with her children, and resolved so as to leave them nothing to her. Meeting with this young man—now her husband—he told him that he was poor, and that if he would marry her, and take care of her for the few years she lived, the property should be his.

About two miles from Peekskill, New York, is a farm of thirty-six acres, which Henry Ward Beecher purchased a few years ago, at a cost of $1,000 per acre. Improvements have been made upon it at an expense of $15,000, and $10,000 more are proposed to be raised. There is an extensive pear orchard, and one of apples. The house, which is a model, is almost finished, being, as surrounded by forest and fruit trees. Vineyards are on a large scale, strawberries are abundant, and the flowers are beautiful. Chrysanthemums are grown for the market. Flowers grow in great profusion. Mr. Beecher gives his own labor to improving much to the department. His theory is to commence with just as much land as he can do justice to, and increase it in a just state of cultivation.

The San Francisco Bulletin says that there is scarcely a day in the year in the six of which a steamer sailing from New York to San Francisco may be made entirely by rail. Probably in a year or two miles of track per day are now being regularly laid by the two companies.

The following mythological account of the origin of the rainbow was recently discovered, written in almost illegible characters, on the back of an ancient manuscript of Anthon's Classical Dictionary. On investigation, we are convinced that it was a translation of Iris, the goddess of the rainbow. But, unfortunately, the initials affixed are almost obliterated by—an internal evidence, we think—a blotch of tobacco juice applied to identify:

ORIGIN OF THE RAINBOW.

[From the ancient Mythology.]

And Jupiter to Vulcan said, "Go you a rainbow,
Let that be the token, let one that will please,
And all other colors from that shall disperse,
But put them where you like, from the east, or west,
I've promised Juno, and I will not break my word,
I will make him a rainbow, that I will declare,
But I would like a rainbow to depart from,
And a token of peace to be in the heart atop it, eh?

So Vulcan, on Sunday, showed sunshine for yellow,
On Monday he got blue, for they told him your fellows,
On Tuesday he got green, for they told him your fellows,
That today they were green with envy, eh?
On Thursday, he searched through the garden for orange,
On Friday, he got red, for they told him your fellows,
On Saturday he hunted the whole world over,
And found that violet was in Saturday night.

One sunshiny evening, just after a shower,
Jupiter looked out of the window for his pay;
But Vulcan, he thought, would not be there,
So Vulcan's children played tricks and faked away.
"How now, old gentleman, what do you see?"
Your rainbow, old Vulcan, is looking just crazy,
Your rainbow, old Vulcan, is looking just crazy,
And I never would have it, if I were you."

Once a traveler asked days a man went into a photographic saloon to get his picture taken. "How do you want it?" inquired the artist. "In a single word," replied the impatient man, "I want it as it is."

Among the curiosities of the Centennial Exhibition will be put in fossils that in 1876 would have been quickly recognized.

Chicago is busy building churches—a good sign. Twenty-five new churches will be completed or commenced then this year.

THE EARTHQUAKES IN SOUTH AMERICA.

VARIOUS parts of the coast of South America, as far east as the Andes range, was visited on August 13, 14, 15, and 16 by one of the most terrible and disastrous earthquakes which has ever been recorded, property to the value of several hundred millions and thirty-two thousand human lives being destroyed! There were no less than seventy-six distinct and separate shocks, accompanied by two of the terribly disastrous waves or "walls of the sea" which have of late come to be called "tidal waves." In one instance the "wall of the sea" was forty feet high and resistless in its power, overwhelming every thing in its way and submerging whole cities. The most southern point, as far as can be heard from at present, touched by the earthquake was Cobijas, Bolivia. It then ranged due north through Peru as far as Callao, but not extending east of the Andes; it seems to have "gone out to sea" at Callao, and then returned to land near Guayaquil, Ecuador, here entering the Andes mountains and ranging through Quito, Ibarra, San Pablo, etc., due north to a distance not yet known. In its disastrous course it wholly destroyed the cities and towns of Arica, Arequipa, Iquique, Moquequa, Locmoba, Pisagua, Peru, and Ibarra, San Pablo, Atantaqui, Imantad, Otovalo, and Cotocachi, Ecuador, besides damaging Callao and Lima, Peru, Quito, Ecuador, and several small towns in Bolivia north of Cobijas. The full extent of the damage done can not at present be estimated, as many of the interior towns visited by the earthquakes have not been and can not be heard from for some days. Later accounts will probably show that the damage done to property is greater than at first reported, but it is to be hoped that the first estimate of the number of lives lost is greatly exaggerated.

We give on this page views of the cities of Arica, Callao, and Arequipa as they appeared previous to the earthquake, and append a brief account of each.

Arica is a principal seaport town of Peru, and numbered as its population about 7000 souls. Its bay is one of the finest on the coast, and several vessels were at anchor in it at the time of the earthquake, including the United States ships Wateree and Fredonia. On the morning of August 13, at about half past five o'clock, a rumbling noise was heard, the providential premonition of the coming earthquake; and, used to the terrible warning, the people fled to the Plaza and suburbs. A few moments after the earth commenced to move visibly, and the motion continued for four or five minutes, when the shock became so severe as to destroy buildings constructed of the heaviest stone and cement. First the waters in the bay rose to a tremendous height, and immediately following came an enormous tidal wave, rising like a water-spout, and then assuming a wall-like appearance. The sea receded for a distance of seventy yards, and, returning, rose to a height of fifty feet above the usual high-water-mark. The store-ship Fredonia was torn into fragments by this wave, and all hands on board drowned. The Wateree was carried half a mile on land, and, although not seriously injured, is considered by the captain in his official report as lost to the service, the difficulties of getting her to the beach being almost insurmountable. On this ship only one man, a sailor, was drowned. Lieutenant-Commander JOHNSON, of this vessel, was on shore endeavoring to save his wife, by carrying her in his arms to some place of security, when she was struck by a portion of a falling building, and instantly killed. All the edifices in the town were completely destroyed. Among them was the Custom-house, containing more than four millions of dollars worth of goods, all of which, of course, shared the same fate. To the earthquake was soon added a general conflagration, and what the fury of the elements spared was destroyed by the drunken and infuriated rabble, who broke open every store and liquor keg.

Arequipa is a city of the interior, and lies at the western base of the Peruvian Andes, and just underneath the great volcano of Arequipa, or Misti, as it is more properly called. It was built almost wholly of stone and lava from the volcano, and of unusual strength for South American cities. The premonitory sounds of the earthquake enabled the greater portion of the fifty thousand inhabitants to fly to the plaza and the river banks for safety, and though the city was completely destroyed the loss of life was not proportionate to the destruction of property. The first shock was succeeded by others of greater force; in three minutes more the soil shook so that it was almost impossible to stand. The strongest buildings began then to cast off stones, pieces of wood, etc., and the weakest began to fall, almost all of them level with the ground. In about five minutes from the first movement the whole city was enveloped in clouds of dust and darkness, and resounded with the crash of falling buildings. There is not one house left standing in Arequipa. The only church tower left is that of Santa Catalina, but it will have to be pulled down. Nearly all the inmates of the prison and hospitals perished. Many persons are known to have been crushed to death in the streets.

Callao was only partially destroyed, but it suffered terribly. The first shock was very severe there, and the people, remembering the great calamity of 1758, hastened to place themselves beyond the reach of danger. At ten o'clock at night the sea commenced to become agitated, and shortly after that hour a tremendous wave burst over the line of houses edging the shore, and in some cases completely gutted them of their contents. The panic was extreme. Not one thought was given to the preservation of property, but all endeavors were directed to personal safety. Yet no lives were lost. Throughout the night the sea continued thus, and the ships were swung in all directions by the force of the different currents. Several vessels collided, but no damage of importance took place. The men-of-war and steamers left the dangerous neighborhood of the bay, and proceeded out to sea, waiting for daylight and quiet. During the night of the 14th fire was discovered proceeding from a hotel situated in the centre of the business portion of the town, and fifty-seven houses and stores were utterly destroyed, and a loss of a million and a half of dollars inflicted upon the unfortunate victims.

Fuller details of this terrible visitation will probably reach us by the next steamer from Aspinwall, together with illustrations of the scenes and incidents of the disaster, which we hope to give in our next issue.

THE STOCKBROKER AT DINGLEWOOD.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

I have often been impatient in reading books to find the story go on from one party to another, from one ball to another, as if life had nothing more important in it. But sometimes no doubt it does happen so. The life of the Greshams was made up of balls and parties; they were never alone; Dinglewood blazed out to the skies every evening, and the carriages flashed out and in, and one kind of merry-making or another went on all day. Lottie Stoke was there continually, and there grew up a curious friendship, half strife half accord, between Gerald and herself. He had nothing to do with the business as it turned out, and consequently was not half so rich. But still he was very well off. I don't know what it is about people in business which gives them a kind of primitive character: they are less sophisticated than the rest of us, though possibly not more simple. The Greshams took a simple pleasure in pleasure for itself, without making it a mere medium for other things, as most of us do. They were fond of company, fond of dancing, delighted with picnics, and even with croquet, without any ulterior motive, like children. They were fond even of their wealth, which gave them so many pretty and so many pleasant things. They enjoyed it with all their hearts, and took an innocent-foolish delight in it, which spiteful people set down to purse-pride; but which in reality was more like the open satisfaction of children in their dear possessions. Gerald was a very different being: I never saw him without feeling that his visit was not a mere visit, but had some motive in it. Before Lottie roused him to talk and battle with her, he would look on at their great parties with a curious, anxious, dissatisfied air, as if he suspected or feared something. I think poor Lottie went further than she meant to go: she grew interested herself, when she had meant only to interest him, and was more excited by his presence than he was by hers. They carried on a kind of perpetual duel, very amusing to the spectators, and there was no doubt that he liked it. But he liked Lucy's funny little shy speeches too; and he had some interest more absorbing, more serious than either, which made his face very grave when the two girls were not there. Harry Gresham had sometimes the air of getting impatient of his brother's presence. Now and then they passed my house walking together, and not enjoying their walk, according to appearances. Once as I stood at my gate I heard Harry say, sharply, "In any case Ada has her settlement," with a defiant air. And Gerald's face was full of remonstrance and expostulation. I could not help taking a great interest in these young people, and feeling a little anxious at the general aspect of affairs.

Things were in this state when the ball was given on Mrs. Gresham's birthday. I had nobody to take charge of for a wonder, and nothing to do but look on. The entire suit of rooms was thrown open, ablaze with light and sweet with flowers. There were great banks of geraniums in every corner where they could be piled, and the whole neighborhood had been ravaged for roses. The room in which I took refuge was the smallest of all, which had been old Lady Sarah's boudoir in old times, and was a little removed from the dancing, and cooler than the rest. It had one little projecting window, not large enough to be called a bay, which looked out upon the terrace just above the spot where the old couple used to sit in the summer days. It was open, and the moon streamed in, making a curious contrast with the floods of artificial light. Looking out from it you could see the Thames, like a silver ribbon, at the bottom of the slope, and the little island and the little house gleaming out white, with intense black shadows. Lottie Stoke came up to me while I stood at the window, and looked out over my shoulder. "It looks like the ghost of the river and the ghost of the island," she said, putting her pretty arm round my waist with an agitated grasp. "I almost think we are all ghosts too."

"A curious moment to think so," said Gerald Gresham. My back was turned to them, so that I did not see him, but there sounded something like a thrill of excitement in the half sneer of his voice.

"Not curious at all," said Lottie; "how many of us are really here do you think? I know where Mrs. Mulgrave is! She is outside on the terrace with old Lady Sarah, listening to the old people's talk; though I am holding her fast all the same. We are in all sorts of places, the real halves of us; but our doubles do the dancing and the laughing, and eat the ices quite as well. It is chilly to be a ghost," said Lottie, with a laugh; "come in from the window, I am sure there is a draught there."

"There is no draught," said Gerald; "you are afraid of being obliged to go into particulars, that is all."

"I am not in the least afraid," said Lottie. "There is Mrs. Damerel. She is in the nursery at the Rectory, though you think you have her here. She is counting Agatha's curl-papers to see if there is the right number; for children are never properly attended to when the mother's eye is wanting. I don't know where you are, Mr. Gerald Gresham; that would be too delicate an inquiry. But look, your brother has gone upon 'Change, though he is in the middle of his guests. He looks as like business as if he had all the Reduced Consols on his mind; he looks as if—good Heavens!"

Lottie stopped, and her tone was so full of alarm and astonishment that I turned suddenly round to look too, in a fright. Harry Gresham was standing at the door; he had a yellow envelope in his hand, another of those terrible telegrams which are always bringing misery. He had turned round unawares facing us, and facing the stream of people who were always coming and going. I never saw in all my life so ghastly a face. It showed the more that he was so ruddy and cheerful by nature. In a moment every tinge of color had disappeared from it. His mouth was drawn down, his blue eyes looked awful, shrinking back, as it were, among the haggard lines of the eyelids. The sight of him struck Lottie dumb, and came upon me like a touch of horror. But Gerald, it was evident, was not taken by surprise. Some crisis which he had been looking for had come at last.

"He has had some bad news," he said; "excuse me, my mother is ill—it must be that;" and he went through the stream of guests, fording the current, as it were, with noiseless rapidity. As for Lottie, she drew me back into the recess of the window and clung to me and cried—but not for Harry Gresham. Her nerves were at the highest strain, and broke down under this last touch; that was all.

"I knew something was going to happen," she said. "I felt it in the air; but I never thought it was coming upon them."

"It must be his mother," I said, though I did not think so. "Hush, Lottie! don't frighten her, poor child."

Lottie was used to restraining herself, and the tears relieved her. She dried her eyes and gave me a nervous hug as she loosed her arm from my waist.

"I can not stand this any longer," she said; "I must go and dance, or something. I know there is trouble coming, and if I sit quiet I shall make a fool of myself. But you will help them if you can," she cried in my ear. Alas, what could I do?

By the time she left me the brothers had disappeared; and after half an hour's waiting, as nothing seemed to come of it, and as the heat increased, I went to the window again. The moon had gone off the house, but still shone white and full on the lawn, like a great sheet of silvery gauze bound and outlined by the blackest shadow. My mind had gone away from that temporary interruption. I was not thinking about the Greshams at all, when all at once I heard a rustle under the window. When I looked down two figures were standing there in the shadow. I thought at first they were robbers, perhaps murderers waiting to waylay some one. All my self-command could not restrain a faint exclamation. There seemed a little struggle going on between the two. "You don't know her," said the one; "why should you trust her?" "She is safer than the servants," said the other, "and she is fond of poor Ada." If my senses had not been quickened by excitement and alarm I should never have heard what they said. Then something white was held up to me in a hand that trembled.

"Give it to Ada," said Harry Gresham, in a quick, breathless, imperative voice.

I took the bit of paper and clutched it in my hand, not knowing what I did, and then stood stupefied, and saw them glide down in the dark shadow of the house toward the river. Where were they going? What had happened? This could be no sudden summons to a mother's death-bed. They went cautiously in the darkness, the two brothers, keeping among the trees; leaning out of the window as far as I could, I saw Gerald's slighter figure and poor Harry's portly one emerge into the moonlight close to the river, just upon the public road. Then I felt some one pull me on the other side. It was Lottie who had come back, excited, to ask if I had found out any thing.

"I thought you were going to stretch out of the window altogether," she said, with a half-suspicious glance; and I held my bit of paper tight, with my fan in my other hand.

"I was looking at the moon," I said. "It is a lovely night. I am sorry it has gone off the house. And then the rooms are so hot inside."

"I should like to walk on the terrace," said Lottie, "but my cavalier has left me. I was engaged to him for this dance, and he has never come to claim it. Where has he gone?"

"I suppose he must have left the room," I said.

"I suppose it is their mother who is ill; perhaps they have slipped out quietly not to disturb the guests. If that is the case you should go and stand by Mrs. Gresham, Lottie. She will want your help."

"But they never would be so unkind as to steal away like this and leave every thing to Ada!" cried Lottie. "Never! Harry Gresham would not do it for twenty mothers. As for Gerald, I dare say any excuse—"

And here she stopped short, poor girl, with an air of exasperation, and looked ready to cry again.

"Never mind," I said; "go to Mrs. Gresham. Don't say any thing, Lottie, but stand by her. She may want it, for any thing we know."

"As you stood by us," said Lottie, affectionately; and then she added, with a sigh and a faint little smile, "But it never could be so bad as that with them."

I did not make her any reply. I was faint and giddy with fear and excitement; and just then, of course, Admiral Fortis's brother, a hazy old gentleman, who was there on a visit, and havered for hours together, whenever he could get a listener, hobbled up to me. He had got me into a corner, as it were, and built intrenchments round me before I knew, and then he began his longest story of how his brother had been appointed to the Bellerophon, and how it was his interest that did it. The thing had happened half a century before, and the Admiral had not been at sea at all for half that time, and here was a present tragedy going on beside us, and the message of fate crushed up with my fan in my hand. Lottie Stoke made her appearance in the doorway several times, casting appealing looks at me. Once she beckoned, and pointed energetically to the drawing-room in which poor little Mrs. Gresham was. But when I got time to think, as I did while the old man was talking, I thought it was best, on the whole, to defer giving my letter, whatever it was. It could not be any thing trifling or temporary which made the master of the house steal away in the darkness. I have had a good many things put into my hands to manage, but I don't think I ever had any thing so difficult as this. For I did not know, and could not divine, what the sudden misfortune was which I had to conceal from the world. All this time Mr. Fortis went on complacently with his talk about the old salt-water lords who were dead and gone. He stood over me, and was very animated; and I had to look up to him, and nod and smile, and pretend to listen. What ghosts we were, as Lottie said! My head began to swim at last as Mr. Fortis's words buzzed in my ear. "'My lord, I said, 'my brother's services—not to speak of my own family influence'"— This formed a kind of chorus to it, and came in again and again. He was only in the middle of his narrative when Lottie came up, making her way through all obstacles. She was trembling, too, with excitement which had less foundation than mine.

"I can't find Mr. Gresham any where," she whispered. "He is not in any of the rooms; none of the servants have seen him, and it is time for supper. What are we to do?"

"Is Ada alarmed?" said I.

"No; she is such a child," said Lottie. "But she is beginning to wonder. Come and say something to her. Come and do something. Don't sit forever listening to that tiresome old man. I shall go crazy if you do not come; and she dancing as if nothing had happened!"

Mr. Fortis had waited patiently while this whispering went on. When I turned to him again he went on the same as ever. "This was all to the senior sea-lord, you understand, Mrs. Mulgrave. As for the other—"

"I hope you will tell me the rest another time," I said, like a hypocrite. "I must go to Mrs. Gresham. Lottie has come to fetch me. I am so sorry—"

"Don't say any thing about it," said Mr. Fortis. "I shall find an opportunity," and he offered me his arm. I had to walk with him, looking quite at my ease, through all those pretty groups, one and another calling to me as I passed. "Oh, please tell me if my wreath is all right," Nelly Fortis whispered, drawing me from her uncle. "Mrs. Mulgrave, will you look if I am torn?" cried another. Then pair after pair of dancers came whirling along, making progress dangerous. Such a sight at any time, when one is past the age at which one takes a personal interest in it, is apt to suggest a variety of thoughts; but at this moment! Lottie hovered about me, a kind of avant courrier, clearing the way for me. There was something amazing to me in her excitement, especially as, just at the moment when she was laboring to open a way for me, Ada Gresham went flying past, her blue eyes shining, her cheeks more like roses than ever. She gave me a smiling little nod as her white dress swept over my dark one, and was gone to the opposite end of the room before I could say a word. Lottie drew her breath hard at the sight. Her sigh sounded shrill as it breathed past me. "Baby!" she whispered. "Doll!" And then the tears came to her eyes. I was startled beyond description by her looks. Had she come to care for Gerald in the midst of that worldly dreadful scheme of hers? or what did her agitation mean?

It was time for supper, however, and the elders of the party began to look for it; and there were a good many people wondering and inquiring where was Mr. Gresham? where were the brothers? Young ladies stood with injured faces, who had been engaged to dance with Harry or Gerald; and Ada herself, when her waltz was over, began to look about anxiously. By this time I had got rid of Mr. Fortis, and made up my mind what to do. I went up to her and stopped her just as she was asking one of the gentlemen had he seen her husband?—where was Harry? I kept Harry's bit of paper fast in my hand. I felt by instinct that to give her that would only make matters worse. I made up the best little story I could about old Mrs. Gresham's illness.

"They both went off quite quietly, not to disturb the party," I said. "I was to put off telling you as long as I could, my dear, not to spoil your pleasure. They could not help themselves. They were very much put out at the thought of leaving you. But Sir Thomas will take Mr. Gresham's place; and you know they were obliged to go."

Tears sprang to poor Ada's eyes. "Oh, how unkind of Harry," she cried, "to go without telling me. As if I should have kept on dancing had I known. I don't understand it at all—to tell you, and go without a word to me!"

"My dear, he would not spoil your pleasure," I said; "and it would have been so awkward to send all these people away. And you know she may get better after all."

"That is true," said easy-minded Ada. "It would have been awkward breaking up the party. But it is odd about mamma. She was quite well yesterday. She was to have been here to-night."

"Oh, it must have been something sudden," I cried at the end of my invention. "Shall I call Sir Thomas? What can I do to be a help to you? You must be Mr. and Mrs. Gresham both in one for to-night."

Ada put her laced handkerchief up to her eyes and smiled a faint smile. "Will you tell Sir Thomas?" she said. "I feel so bewildered I don't know what to do."

Then I commenced another progress in search of Sir Thomas, Lottie Stoke still hovering about me as pale as a spirit. She took my arm as we went on. "Was that all a story?" she whispered in my ear, clasping my arm tightly with her hands. I made her no answer; I dared not venture even to let her see my face. I went and told the same story very circumstantially over again to Sir Thomas. I hope it was not a great sin; indeed, it might be quite true for any thing I could tell. It was the only natural way of accounting for their mysterious absence; and every body was extremely sorry, of course, and behaved as well as possible. Old Mrs. Gresham was scarcely known at Dinglewood, and Ada, it was evident, was not very profoundly affected after the first minute by the news, so that, on the whole, the supper-table was lively enough, and the very young people even strayed into the dancing-room after it. But of course we knew better than that when trouble had come to the house. It was not much above one o'clock in the morning when they were all gone. I pretended to go too, shaking off Lottie Stoke as best I could, and keeping out of sight in a corner while they all streamed away. On the whole, I think public opinion was in favor of Harry Gresham's quiet departure without making any disturbance. "He was a very good son," people said, and then some of them speculated if the poor lady died how Harry and his wife would manage to live in the quietness which family affliction demanded. "They will bore each other to death," said a lively young man. "Oh, they are devoted to each other," cried a young lady. Not a suspicion entered any one's mind. The explanation was quite satisfactory to every body but Lottie Stoke; but then she had seen Harry Gresham's face.

When I had made quite sure that every one was gone, I stole back quietly into the blazing deserted rooms. Had I ever been disposed to moralize over the scene of a concluded feast, it certainly would not have been at that moment. Yet there was something pathetic in the look of the place—brilliant as day, with masses of flowers every where, and that air of lavish wealth, prodigality, luxury—and to feel that one carried in one's hand something that might turn it into the scene of a tragedy, and wind up its bright story with the darkest conclusion. My heart beat loud as I went in. My poor little victim was still in the dancing-room—the largest and brightest of all. She had thrown herself down on her sofa, with her arms flung over her head like a tired child. Tears were stealing down her pretty cheeks. Her mouth was pouting and melancholy. When she saw me she rose with a sudden start, half annoyed, half pleased, to have some one to pour out her troubles upon. "I can't help crying," she said. "I don't mean to blame Harry; but it was unkind of him to go away without saying a word to me. We never, never parted in that way before;" and from tears the poor little woman fell into sobs—grievous, innocent sobs, all about nothing, but broke one's heart.

"I have come to tell you something," I said, "though I don't know myself what it is. I am afraid it is something worse than you think. I said that because your brother-in-law said it; but I don't believe it is any thing about Mrs. Gresham. Your husband put this into my hand through the window as he went away. Take courage, dear. You want all your courage—you must keep up for the sake of the children, Ada!"

I babbled on, not knowing what words I used, and she stared at me with bewildered eyes. "Into your hand through the window!" she said. "I don't understand. She looked at the paper as if it were a charm. Then she opened it slowly, half afraid, half stupefied. Its meaning did not seem to penetrate her mind at first. After a while she gave a loud sudden shriek, and turned her despairing eyes on me. Her cry was so piercing and sudden that it rang through the house and startled every one. She was on the verge of hysterics, and incapable of understanding what we said to her, but the sight of the servants rushing to the door to ask what was the matter, brought her to herself. She made a brave effort and recovered something like composure, while I sent them away; and then she held out to me the letter which she had stretched in her hand. It was written in pencil, and some words were illegible. This was what Harry said:

"Something unexpected has happened to me, my darling. I am obliged to leave you without even one to say good-by. You will know all about it only too soon. It is not, Ada—and it is my only solace—that I never meant to defraud my man. God knows I never meant it. My darling, my darling, don't, don't believe it will blow over, and you will be able to join me. I will write to you as soon as I am safe. No—there is no settlement. Don't let any body persuade you to tamper with your settlement. My father will take care of that. Why should you and the children share my ruin? Forgive me, dearest, for the trouble I have brought on you. I dare not pause to think of it. Recall to Arith me if they come after me, say I have gone to Bishop's Hope."

"What does it mean?" cried poor Ada, close to my ear. "Oh, tell me, you are our friend. What does it mean?"

"God knows," I said. My own mind could not take it in, still less could I convey the vague horrors that floated across me. We sat together with the lights blazing round us, the grand piano open, the musicians stands still in their places. Ada was dressed like a queen of fairies, or of flowers: her gown was white, covered with showers of rose-buds; and she had a crown of white roses in her bright hair. I don't know how it was that her dress and appearance suddenly impressed themselves on me at that moment, it was the horror of the contrast, I suppose. She looked me piteously in the face, giving up all attempt at thought for her own part, asking the explanation from me. "What is it?" she asked.

"Why has he gone away? who is coming after him? Oh, my Harry! my Harry! The poor young creature moaned. What could I say? I took her in my arms and kissed her. I could do no more.

At this moment there came a loud knocking at the door. The house had fallen into a deadly stillness, and at that hour of the night, and in the state we were, the sound was horrible. It rang through the place as if it had now a new habitat, waking echoes every where. Ada's very lips grew white—she clasped her small hands together and wrung them. "It is some one who has forgotten something," I said, but my agitation was so great that I felt a difficulty in speaking. We sat and listened in frightful suspense while the door was opened and the sound of voices reached us. It was not Harry who had come back: it was not any one belonging to the place. Suddenly Ada rushed to the door with a flash of momentary petulance which stimulated strength. "I'll go to any one for Mr. Gresham—bring him in here," she cried, imperiously, hurried after her and took her hand. It was like touching an electric machine. She was so strung to the highest pitch that only to touch her made me thrill and vibrate all over. And then the two men—two homely black figures—startled even in spite of their acquaintance with strange sights, came hesitatingly forward into the blazing light to confront the flower-crowned, jewelled, dazzling creature, made up of rose and lily, and diamond and pearl. They stood thunder-struck before her, notwithstanding the massive air of their trade. Probably they had never in their lives seen such an apparition before. The force most of the two took off his hat with a look of deprecation. I do not think Ada had the least idea who they were. They were her husband's enemies, endowed with a certain dignity by that fact. But I knew in a moment, by instinct, that they must be London detectives in search of him, and that the very worst possibility of our fears had come true.

I can not tell what we said to these men or they to us; they were not harsh nor unfeeling: they were even startled and awe-struck in their rough way, and stepped across the room cautiously, as if afraid of hurting something. We had to take them over all the house, through the rooms in which not a single light had been extinguished. To see us in our ball dresses, amidst all that silent useless blaze of light, leading these men about, must have been a dreadful sight. For my part, though my share in it was nothing, I felt my limbs shake under me when we had gone over all the rooms below. Ada took them all over the house. They asked her questions and she answered them in her simplicity. Crime might have fled out of that house, joyous home; but it was innocence, candid and open, with nothing to conceal, which dwelt there. I had to interfere at last and tell them we would answer no more questions; and then they comforted and encouraged us in their way. With this fine house, and all these pretty things, you'll have a good bit of money yet," said the superior of the two, "and if Mr. Gresham was to pay up, they might come to terms."

"Then is it debt?" cried I, with a sudden bound of hope.

The man gave a short laugh. "It's debt to the law," he said. "It's felony, and that's bad; but if you could give us a bit of a clew to where he is, and this young lady would see 'em and try, why it mightn't be so bad after all. Folks often lets a gentleman go when they won't let a common man."

"Would money do it?" cried poor Ada; "and I have my settlement. Oh, I will give you any thing, every thing I have, if you'll let my poor Harry go."

"We haven't got him yet, ma'am," said the man.

"If you can find us any clew—"

And it was then I interfered: I could not permit him to go on with these dreadful questions to poor Ada. When they went away she sank down on a sofa near that open window in the boudoir from which I had seen my poor friend. The window had grown by this time "a glimmering square," full of the blue light of early dawn. The birds began to chirp and stir in the trees; the air which had been so soft and refreshing grew chill and made us shiver in our light dresses; the roses in Ada's hair began to fade and shed their petals silently over her white shoulders. As long as the men were present she had been perfectly self-possessed, now suddenly she burst into a wild torrent of tears. "Oh, Harry, my Harry, where is he? why did not he take me with him?" she cried. I can not say any more, though I think every particular of that dreadful night is learned in on my memory; every sight and word are current in my recollection before.

Then I got Ada to go to bed, and kept off from her the inquisitive maid-servant in powder who came to know if he was to sit up for master. Your master has gone to Bishop's Hope," I said, "and will not return to-night;" the fellow received what I said with a sneer. He knew as well, or pretended to know as well, as I did what was coming. Every body would know it next day. The happy house had toppled down like a house of cards. Nothing was left but the unhappy creature in the unconscious babies, to fight their battle with the world. There are moments when the sense of a new day begun is positive horror. When poor Ada fell into a troubled sleep, I wrapped myself up and opened the window and let in the fresh morning air. Looking out over the country, I felt as if I could see every thing. There was no charitable shadow now to hide a flying figure: every eye would be upon Harry, every creature spying his flight. Where was Harry? When I looked at the girl asleep—she was but a girl, notwithstanding her babies—and thought of the horror she would wake to, it made my heart sick. And her mother was dead. There seemed no one to stand by her in her trouble but a stranger like me.

PRACTICAL JOKES.

PRACTICAL joking is at a discount. Practical jokes are vulgar, ill-bred, brutal, ill-natured; and it is really impossible to deny that the popular verdict is a correct one; but how amusing they often are!

You must, in your youth, have either set or fallen into a "booby-trap." It consisted, you may remember, of books, boots, etc., balanced on the top of a door, which was left ajar, so that the first incomer got a solid shower-bath.

Another trick was to procure from a stone ink-bottle, cork it tightly, and slip it between the bars of a boy's grate on a winter's evening, when he was returning to his room after a temporary absence—the nozzle, of course, directed toward his chair. The tenant returned, and sat down to his verses or translation; presently the ware began to boil, and the steam fired off the cork at him.

Perhaps the decline of practical joking, both in the army and among civilians, is due in a great measure to the abolition of dueling. It seems unsafe to play off a practical joke who has no redress in case he should take serious offense; and this, undoubtedly, is the weak part of the practice, that it necessitates a challenge. This is the case, indeed, with the majority of our amusements: one can not win a game without another losing it; fox-hunting is unpleasant for the fox; and shooting entails pain and death upon the objects of our sport; neither does any body, however good a face he may put upon the matter, like to be made game of. But in the last instance there is an element of treachery which distinguishes it from the others; to insure the success of a practical joke it is generally necessary to lull the victim into a false security.

A French author of accounts in the seventeenth century was a great practical joker all his life, and even played a trick after he had lost the power of enjoying it, for he left four large candles to be carried at his funeral, which had not been burning fifteen minutes before they went off as fire-works.

When a lady confesses to a practical joke it is generally a very innocent one. Mrs. Boncorn, the rich financier, was very stingy to his wife in the matter of pin-money. One day a lady, closely veiled, and very anxious not to be recognized, called upon him and borrowed a large sum, leaving her diamonds as a pledge. It was his wife.

The French theater sometimes used to steal a funny that even their victims were half inclined to pardon them.

The Duke of Frousse, nephew of Marshal Richelieu, was coming out of the opera one night in a splendid dress embroidered with pearls, when two thieves managed to cut off his coat-tails. He turned into his club, where every body laughed at him, and so he found out what had happened, and went home. Early the next morning a well-dressed man called at the Duke's hotel, and demanded to see him at once on a matter of most vital importance. Monsieur de Frousse was awakened. "Monseigneur," said the visitor, "I am an officer of the police. Monsieur the lieutenant of police has learned the accident which happened to you yesterday on leaving the opera, and I have been sent by him to request you to order the coat to be placed in my hands, that we may convict the offenders by comparing it with the mutilated tails." The dress was given up, and the Duke was in raptures with the vigilance of the police. But it was a new trick of the rogues who had stolen the tails, by which he possessed himself of the entire garment.

The ancients used to indulge in practical jokes to a considerable extent; for instance, the Thracians, at their drinking-parties, sometimes played the game of hanging. They fixed a round noose to the bough of a tree, and placed underneath it a stone of such a shape that it would easily turn round when any one stood on it. Then they drew lots; and he who drew the lot took a sickle in his hand, stood on the stone, and put his neck into the halter. The stone was kicked away, and if he could cut himself down with the sickle well and good; but if he was not quick enough, he was hanged outright; "and the rest laugh, thinking it good sport."

Indeed, in the early stages of civilization, practical wit is apt to be grim; as society advances jokes are fewer people's expense are not quite so heartless: when we reach a certain pitch of refinement nothing gives us pleasure which causes pain to another, and then there is a chance of practical joking dying out altogether—except in the case of boys, who will probably never be humanized.

REST.

"Thou hast made us for Thyself; and the heart never resteth till it findeth rest in Thee."—St. Augustine.

MADE for Thyself, O God!
Made for Thy love, Thy service, Thy delight;
Made to show forth Thy wisdom, grace, and might!
Made for Thy praise, whom veiled archangels laud!
O strange and glorious thought, that we may be A joy to Thee!

Yet the heart turns away
From this grand destiny of bliss, and deems
'Twas made for its poor self, for passing dreams!
Chasing illusions netting day by day,
Till for ourselves we read on this world's best,
"This is not rest!"

Nor can the vain toil cease
Till in the shadowy maze of life we meet
One, who can guide our reckless, wayward feet,
To find Himself, our Way, our Life, our Peace.
In Him the long unrest is soothed and stilled;
Our hearts are filled.

O rest, so true, so sweet!
(Would it were shared by all the weary world!)
Neath shadowing banner of His love unfurled,
We bend to kiss the Master's pierced feet.
Then lean our love upon his boundless breast,
And know God's rest!

MECHANICAL.—Is the company for the making of artificial limbs a convenient one?

"There is but one good wife in this town," said a clergyman in the course of his sermon (the congregation looked expectant): "and every married man thinks he's got her," added the minister.

A LITERARY ODDITY.

The Brewers should to Malta go,
The Boddles all to Reilly,
The Quakers to the Friendly Isles,
The Furriers to Chili.

The little, snarling, carolling "babes,"
That break our nightly rest,
Should be packed off to Baby-lon,
To Lapland, or to Brest.

From Bolt-head Cooks go o'er to Greece,
And while the Miner writes

Will here no longer vex us;
And all who ain't provided for
Will emigrate to Texas.

A MONEY ARTICLE—A parcel.

A person who was recently called into court for the purpose of proving the correctness of a doctor's bill was asked by the lawyer whether "the doctor did not make several visits after the patient was out of danger." "No," replied the witness, "I considered the patient in danger as long as the doctor continued his visits."

HOW TO HAVE A RICH JAR.—Crowd twenty fashionably-dressed ladies into one small omnibus. Would this also preserve the tempers of the aforesaid twenty inside?

HOW TO MANAGE BACHELORS.—To Miss-manage them.

REV. S. R. HALL.

THE REV. SAMUEL ROHLLY HALL, the newly-elected President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of England, was born, of Methodist parents, at Bristol, in the year 1812. His great-grandfather was one of JOHN WESLEY'S local preachers for more than fifty-eight years, and from that time to this the succession line of membership with the Wesleyan Church has never been broken. President HALL was educated in a private academy in Bristol. He himself became a member of the Wesleyan Church when he was only twenty years of age; and two of Mr. HALL'S sons are office-bearers and members of the same Church at the present time. Mr. HALL began to preach in 1834; was called into the ministry in 1836, and entered upon its actual duties after two years' training in the clerical college. Mr. HALL has been a total abstainer, though not a pledged one, for many years. He is remarkable for his debating power and general independence; and the Methodist Conference has not had in it a more self-reliant man for many years. Both in the pulpit and out of it few men are more respected, or more deferentially listened to, than Mr. HALL. As a pastor he is a model to many; and especially so in his visits to the poor. President HALL has taken some of the best circuits in Methodism, and will occupy its high places to the end. His conduct in the presidential chair has been able and impartial; and he has shown himself specially expert in disentangling the complications of debate which necessarily arise occasionally, and especially in the fraternal method pursued in the Wesleyan Conference. He secured fair play for every speaker, and that without the least respect of persons. The Wesleyan Conference is now, probably, the largest ecclesiastical assembly in the world, and Mr. HALL is equal to its arduous labor; but if the Conference goes on increasing at its present rate it will be impossible for any one man to bear the burden of the presidency. There are already, according to the reports of the Conference, 342,380 Wesleyan Methodists in Great Britain, an increase since 1867 of 5310, with 24,926 on probation.

REV. S. R. HALL, PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, ENGLAND.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

THERE has lately been erected in the Public Garden, Boston, and near the entrance to the magnificent Commonwealth Avenue, a large monument by J. Q. A. WARD. It is intended to commemorate the discovery of sulphuric ether as an anæsthetic; and it is surmounted by the group which we represent on this page under the name of "the Good Samaritan."

The design originated with Mr. THOMAS LEE, of Boston, and the whole expense of $40,000 is borne by him. The monument now finished has been presented to the city of Boston. The architectural design was made by HENRY VAN BRUNT. The statuary, as executed by Mr. WARD, consists of four bass-reliefs and the group of which we give a representation. The bass-reliefs are intended to illustrate the uses of ether: one represents an operation on the battle-field; another a hospital scene; a third is a figure of Science, with the chemical apparatus with which ether is made, and figures doing homage to the discovery; the fourth, more allegorical in character, represents a man in a condition of suffering with a figure descending to his relief. The design and beauties of the group which we illustrate will be readily perceived by the intelligent reader.

HALLECK'S MONUMENT.

THE friends and admirers of the late FITZ-GREENE HALLECK, the poet, have erected an appropriate monument to his memory at Guilford, Connecticut, the home of his later years and his last resting-place, of which we give herewith an illustration from a sketch by W. S. KNOWLES. It is built of Rhode Island granite, and is seventeen feet high. Upon the front tablet is the simple inscription, in low relief, "FITZ-GREENE HALLECK, 1790–1867," and upon the cornice of the pedestal the following lines from his poem of "Marco Bozaris,"

"One of the few, the immortal names
That were not born to die."

Upon the opposite tablet, in bass-relief, is a lyre supported by two burning torches. On the east end is this inscription, "NATHANIEL HALLECK, 1792-1793." On the west end are the words, "ISRAEL HALLECK, 1754-1829." "MARY ELLIOTT HALLECK, 1762-1819."

The monument occupies a conspicuous position on the main avenue of the Alderbrook Cemetery, or, as it is most generally called, the East Burial-Ground, at Guilford. The present predisposition of the American people to honor with monumental designs the memories of their great and good men, and to preserve, in like manner, the record of their noble and heroic achievements, is a gratifying proof of increased civilization. It indicates an improved art, taste, and, better still, increased reverence for wisdom and virtue.

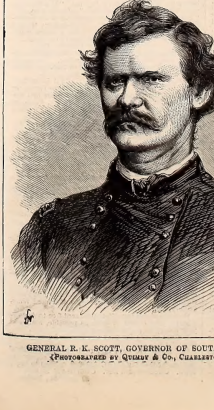
GOV. R. K. SCOTT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE first Governor of reconstructed South Carolina is General ROBERT KINGSTON SCOTT, whose portrait we give on this page.

Governor SCOTT was born in Armstrong County, Pennsylvania, July 8, 1826. His father was a soldier of 1812, and his grandfather served for "seven years or during the war" of Independence. He was educated in Ohio, graduating as an M.D. at Starling Medical College, Columbus, Ohio.



In 1850 he went by the overland route to California; but becoming disenchanted with life in the gold mines, he returned in 1852 to Ohio and settled in Henry County, where he resided up to the breaking out of the rebellion. He at once volunteered and labored assiduously in raising volunteers. He entered the army on the 1st of October, 1861, as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Sixty-Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Accompanying his regiment to the field he was engaged in the capture of Fort Donelson, the battle of Shiloh, and the siege of Corinth. He was commissioned Colonel of his regiment July 3, 1862. He commanded a brigade at Hatchie River, Tennessee, under General S. A. HURLBUT, who highly complimented him in his report of the action. He held the advance of General LOGAN'S Division on the march into Mississippi, and was engaged in the attack upon Fort Gibson, the battles of Raymond, Jackson, and Champion Hills. His regiment was the first to throw up breast-works in front of Fort Hill, Vicksburg; and this position he maintained during the entire siege. Immediately after the fall of Vicksburg he was placed in command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Seventeenth Army Corps, and held that command until it was mustered out of service July 10, 1865, at Louisville, Kentucky.

General SCOTT'S personal adventures during the war were of a remarkable character. In the first action after Hood assumed command of the rebel forces before Atlanta, General SCOTT'S line was broken by an assault, and he was taken prisoner while endeavoring to rally his men. While he was with other prisoners en route for Macon, Georgia, he jumped from the cars at their full speed, escaped, and nearly succeeded in reaching our lines, having subsisted for seven days upon three crackers. But he was recaptured by a party with blood-hounds.

After making the rounds of various rebel prisons he was sent to Charleston, South Carolina, and incarcerated in the common jail, where he remained until September 24, 1864, when he was exchanged in a special cartel made between General SHERMAN and HOOD for prisoners taken by either side in front of Atlanta.

He immediately assumed the command of his former brigade, and was in the advance of General SHERMAN'S entire operations before Atlanta and in the "March to the Sea." He thus again visited South Carolina, in which in the course of three years he has been a prisoner, a victor, and a Governor.

Immediately after the muster out of his command he was ordered to proceed to his home in Ohio and report for orders to the WAR Department. While daily expecting an order mustering him out, he received instructions from General GRANT to report to Major-General O. O. HOWARD, Commissioner of Bureau of R. F. and A. L. for duty. He was assigned to duty as Assistant Commissioner of South Carolina, relieving General RUFUS SAXTON. He continued on this duty until his inauguration as Governor on July 8, 1868, having been the last Brigadier-General of Volunteers retained in the service.

SENATOR F. A. SAWYER, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

HON. FREDERICK A. SAWYER, the newly-elected Senator from South Carolina, was born at Bolton, Worcester County, Massachusetts, in 1823. He graduated at Harvard College in 1844, and afterward taught school with great success in Boston, Lowell, and other places. He married a Miss DELIA GAY, of Nashua, New Hampshire. In 1859, when the State Normal school was established at Charleston, South Carolina, some of the most influential men of that State came North to select a teacher to place at its head. After considerable search Mr. SAWYER was chosen, accepted the position, and moved to Charleston with his family. He was very successful. As the war approached, being entirely Northern on that question, he desired to leave and come North, having excellent positions offered to him. But he yielded to the persuasions of friends of the new school system of the State, who represented to him that if he left the school would be broken up, and he remained at his post as a teacher. When the war was closing the Confederates permitted him and his family to be put aboard the fleet in the harbor and he came North. He delivered a good many addresses at the fall elections of that year at Republican meetings in Massachusetts, and as soon as the internal revenue system was established in South Carolina he was appointed Collector of United States revenue for the Charleston District, which position he held until his election as Senator.

He was the choice of the Legislature after one of the most bitter contests that ever took place in this State, defeating A. G. MACKEY, a native of the State and a prominent Union man. Every means possible were used to defeat a Northern man for the position. Northern residents of the State took upon the election of Mr. SAWYER as one of the greatest victories over prejudice that has occurred in the Southern country. It secures to the Senate a gentleman who will at all times be found advocating justice to all. He and General SCOTT, the Governor, whose portrait we also give on this page, are justly looked upon as true representative men of new South Carolina.

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

THIS disease is the scourge of the Northern and Eastern States beyond any other disease with which the people are familiar. One of the melancholy circumstances attending its insidious inroads into families almost every where is the fact that it fastens principally upon young persons who have just begun to assume social responsibilities.

Because pulmonary consumption is common we lose sight of its painful devastations, mowing down as it does annually, both in town and country, a very large number of young men and women who had just arrived at an age to become important members of society. Besides an hereditary tendency to a disease of the air-tubes and the lungs themselves in some, there are very many cases, perhaps thousands every year, which are induced by violations of well-known laws of health. A large proportion of that class of sufferers who die early are females—not those in poor circumstances exclusively, but in the houses of the well-to-do and the opulent, where the stern demands of fashion oftener peril the standard of youthful health than in places where a life of exposure to all temperatures fortifies the system to meet contingencies. Probably more than half of all the deaths by consumption among young ladies occur in families in which every comfort abounds, and the development of a diseased state of the lungs is brought on by thoughtless exposures which might have been avoided. The neglect of suitable clothing and leaving heated apartments for intensely cold ones are violations of nature's requirements, and so is an imperfectly ventilated sleeping-room and irregularity in domestic habits.

All the medical philosophers in Christendom have failed to convince mothers generally, as they would like to, that little girls should invariably wear very loose dresses. No compression over the chest should be permitted on any account whatever, for fear of bending in the ribs while in a partially flexible cartilaginous condition, which would diminish the capacity of the interior where the breathing organs should have full space for growth and action. If the lungs can not sufficiently inflate to oxyginate the blood the individual will assuredly die prematurely. Let this sanitary truth be kept in remembrance by mothers. The only hope of lessening the yearly mortality of females who are martyrs to pulmonary consumption is to begin with the coming-on generation of little misses. Next, let those who have admonishing symptoms of inflammation, tubercles, or ulcerated lungs, caution others not to be so careless as they have been at the expense of that precious boon—health.

WITH Dyspeptics every thing is wrong. Food does not digest; sleep does not refresh; wine does not cheer; smiles do not gladden; music does not charm, nor can any other joy enter the breast of the miserable dyspeptic. You must get rid of it, or it will become seated and confirmed, and life will be a burden and existence a curse. PLANTATION BITTERS will do away with all this. New life, strength, and energy will take possession of you. The damask will again bloom upon your cheek, and the lustre in your eye will again be as bright as in your healthiest, happiest, and most joyous days.—World.

SPEAKING of the Novelty Clothes-Wringer exhibited at the late Fair of the American Institute, the New York Liberal Christian says:

"The Novelty Wringer received the marked approbation of the jury, and was awarded the highest premium. * * * It is now admitted that it has no equal as a family wringer. * * * It has the patent flange cog-wheels on both ends of the rolls, as well as the most approved appliances for adjusting the pressure, so that a fine lace collar or a heavy woolen blanket can be run through with equal facility and without injury. * * * Indeed, in all respects its superiority is so apparent that the high testimonials it is constantly receiving can be readily accounted for. * * * In fact, whenever and wherever exhibited it invariably secures the highest honors."

ALMOST MIRACULOUS.—We seldom indorse a man in our editorial columns—never, unless convinced that he is deserving, and to speak well of him will result in benefit to the public. It is with this idea that we call attention to the advertisement of Dr. J. A. SHERMAN, No. 697 Broadway, New York, who is performing cures for Hernia, or Rupture, but little less than miraculous, and never before, to our knowledge, attempted or accomplished by any other surgeon. We have with our own eyes seen his cures—are acquainted with men he has brought to health from a living death, and do earnestly advise all who are afflicted to consult with or call upon him. A more meritorious physician does not live. The communication in this week's DEMOCRAT was handed in to us by Geo. Hodges, a man whose life was saved and health restored by Dr. Sherman, as he gave abundant proof, and to it we call attention, knowing those afflicted will thank us if they seek relief and comfort.—La Crosse Democrat.

The following is the statement of Mr. Hodges alluded to in the above article:

TERRIBLE SUFFERINGS FROM RUPTURE, AND FINAL CURE OF GEORGE HODGES, Esq.

READ HIS STATEMENT.

"When a boy, about nine years of age, I became ruptured on both sides, and my parents, anxious for my welfare, sought the advice and aid of our family physician, who procured and adjusted to me a truss, which I wore for some time, under his supervision, without being benefited by it. My parents then sought elsewhere, but to no purpose, for one truss after the other seemed to increase my trouble. When about fifteen years of age it was my good fortune to visit London, where I hoped to find a suitable truss for my case, but there, too, I failed. I could obtain nothing I could wear that would retain it. The next opportunity I had was in this city, where I sought out the most celebrated truss vendors, among whom were the gentlemen to whom I shall hereafter allude, who, from a feeling of humanity, pride, or profit, exhausted all their abilities in my behalf, without any success.

"I tried Dr. Rigg's Hard Rubber Truss, which was painful, without answering the purpose.

"I applied to Dr. Gregory, No. 609 Broadway, who seemed to be quite alarmed when I showed him my case, and declared it to be the worst rupture that he had seen since he had been in New York, for the past twelve years: and after vainly trying on several of his 'White's Patent Trusses,' he gave me up, saying my case was a hopeless one, and if I didn't find some relief it would put me under ground in less than a year; that he could do nothing for me; wouldn't undertake to, and that if any body did, they would only take my money without doing me any good.

"I called on Dr. Pomeroy, No. 553 Broadway, who arranged and fitted on several of his patent trusses, with no better result. Notwithstanding he put on some with great pressure, they did not support my case, and he gave it up, remarking he did not think that I could find any thing to do me any good; my rupture was so bad, he did not see how I had managed to live so long with it.

"After this my attention was directed to Dr. Marsh, of the Astor House, Vesey Street, and I called to see him. He tried on various trusses, which proved a failure. He then decided that his $40 radical cure truss would do, but he would have to prepare one. I left his office feeling rather dubious, yet withal I returned in a day or two after, and Dr. Marsh went to work at me again as though he meant this time to conquer; but he soon dropped his courage, and with it my case, for his radical cure truss, though adjusted, readjusted, and adjusted again and again, was a failure; it could not retain my rupture, although it was applied with painful force. Dr. Marsh, on giving up my case, remarked, 'You are in a critical condition; it's a wonder your rupture has not killed you long ago.' I was again compelled to leave his office doubly disappointed and dejected in spirits. Lamenting my sad fate, yet not abandoning my efforts, a medical gentleman on whom I called advised me to see Dr. Sheldon, No. 710 Broadway, and I did so. Dr. Sheldon, after looking at my case, fixed together and put on several of his patent trusses, all of which failed to hold. He then seemingly determined to govern my case, fixed up one with terrible pressure, which served a little better one way, but worse another, for it seemed as though it would cut me in two in an hour. I could not possibly endure it longer. Dr. Sheldon said it was the best he could do; my case was a very bad one.

"Receiving a circular of the Elastic Truss Company, No. 474 Broadway, which promised a good deal, I called there to see the Superintendent, Dr. Dike, who went at my case, strapping me unbearably tight, without helping my rupture at all.

"Having my attention called to a notice of Dr. E. B. Foote, Lexington Avenue, corner of Twenty-eighth Street, I called to see him, but his attendant, finding my rupture so bad, would not undertake to do any thing for it. This was, indeed, disheartening, and almost forced me to the conclusion that my life was inseparably linked with misery. But, as the sun looks brightest after the most terrific storm, so, after the most searching and unsuccessful trials for relief, the light of science burst upon me brightest through Dr. Sherman's illustrated circular, which casually fell into my hands; and yet, to have the assurance of its being a true light, after, as I may say, having endured a series of storms and gloomy forebodings, I determined to take the advice of Dr. Sayre, corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirtieth Street, who I have heard was one of the most eminent surgeons of this city, before calling on Dr. Sherman, which I did, informing him at the same time of the failure of the persons heretofore alluded to. Dr. Sayre advised me by all means to go to Dr. Sherman and see what he could do, and to come back and let him see me after I got fixed.

"This encouraging advice from Dr. Sayre fanned into a flame the spark of hope kindled in me when I first looked over Dr. Sherman's circular, and I went to his office, No. 697 Broadway, with a step of buoyancy which I had not felt before for years. When I arrived I found several before me, but I waited my turn, and had my case examined. During the examination by Dr. Sherman I did not have the same feelings of dread and fear come upon me that I had when Dr. Marsh, Dr. Gregory, and others examined me, which circumstance tended farther to strengthen my faith in the opinion that I had at last fortunately found some one equal to the task of relieving me. Subsequent to the examination Dr. Sherman gave a more favorable opinion than any of the other parties to whom I had applied, and expressed himself in such sanguine terms that I put myself in his hands, and am now, and have been since that day, a new man, capable of taking the most active exercise without any inconvenience whatever from my rupture. I am now, practically, a sound man, and expect soon to be in point of fact.

"As Dr. Sayre requested me to call and let him see what Dr. Sherman did for me, I stepped in at his office, after proving Dr. Sherman's method a few days, to let him know that I was doing well. He examined me, and was very much pleased, expressing his satisfaction in very strong terms of praise, adding, 'When I first saw your rupture I was afraid that you would not be able to find any thing to do you any good.'

"The way that I have been treated since my rupture first appeared, by the numerous persons who have attempted to relieve me, in view of the relief that I have recently received from Dr. Sherman, forces me to the conclusion that it is not the incurability of rupture, but the bad treatment by injurious pressure the ruptured patient receives, which fastens to him this curse for life, or hurls him with the horrors of strangulated rupture to a premature grave.

"That the reader may more fully realize the horrible condition that I was in when I placed myself in the hands of Dr. Sherman, I would recommend him to see my photographs, taken by order of Dr. Sherman before and after treatment, which may be seen at his office.

"GEORGE HODGES,
"Thirtieth Street, near Sixth Avenue, New York."

MANHATTAN
CO-OPERATIVE
RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

OFFICE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
No. 658 BROADWAY, Cor. Bond St., N. Y.

THE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is chartered by the State of New York.

OBJECT.

The object of this Association is to secure a cash payment within forty days after the death of a member of as many dollars as there are members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.

MEMBERSHIP FEES.

The membership fees are six dollars at joining (for which a policy will be furnished), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which due notice will be given. One dollar from each member goes to the widow or heirs of the deceased member, and the ten cents for the expenses of collecting.

INVESTMENTS.

The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the money received as new membership fees shall be made a sinking fund to meet payments falling due by the delinquencies of members. This fund is held by the

NATIONAL TRUST CO.,

and will be invested in United States Bonds, or real estate, or bond and mortgage upon New York City property, which property shall be double the value of the money so loaned.

THE FUNDS.

The remaining two thirds, after paying the expenses of the Association, shall be invested in real estate in the City of New York, or in bond and mortgage on property in the City of New York, the interest of which shall go to pay the current expenses of the Association. If a deceased member leaves no heirs, the money becomes the property of the Association, with the proviso that the expenses of burial shall be paid out of such funds—said expenses, however, not to exceed one hundred dollars.

A member failing to pay his fee of one dollar and ten cents within thirty days from date of notice, forfeits all claims upon the Association, and also forfeits all money previously paid. In the Pacific States this time is extended to sixty days. A member having no permanent residence must notify the Secretary, and appoint a representative to pay his fees.

When members choose they can send ten dollars and fifty cents to the Treasurer to prepay their fees, which sum will pay for ten deaths, thus saving the trouble of sending $1 10 each time, besides a saving of fifty cents. No man is so poor that he can not pay $6 now, and $1 10 occasionally, thus securing $5000 to his heirs. The average number of dollars each person will have to pay to secure $5000 will be $30 per year, a little over fifty cents per week. This makes this mode of insurance cost about one sixth what they would have to pay any regular Insurance Company for a $5000 policy.

This company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women. As soon as these classes are filled ten new classes will be adopted. Men and women are not allowed in the same classes. Every thing is done to make each class equal.

CLASSES.

In class A all persons betw'n the ages of 15 and 20 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 20 and 25 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 25 and 30 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 40 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 45 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 50 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 55 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 60 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 65 yrs.

The classes for women are the same as above. Any one that is found to give his or her age wrong will be expelled, and the moneys paid forfeited to the Association. Each class is limited to 5000 members. Each person pays $6 upon becoming a member, and $1 10 each time a member dies belonging to the same class he or she may be a member of.

A member of one class can not be assessed this dollar if a member of another class dies. Each class is INDEPENDENT, having no connection with any other.

ILLUSTRATION.

Class "A" has 5000 male members. A man dies. The Association pays over, within forty days, $5000 to the widow or heirs, and the remaining members forward, within thirty days, $1 10 each to the Association to reimburse it. Failing to send this sum, they forfeit to the Association all moneys paid, and the Association supplies a new member to fill the place of the retiring one.

ADVANTAGES.

The advantages of this Association over ordinary Life Insurance Companies are, no panics can break it; the fees are so small, and required to be paid at such long intervals, that any man can secure to his family a competency upon his death.

HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.

Any one desiring to become a member must send $6, in check, bank draft, postal order, or by express, the expressage being paid by the applicant. Under no circumstance will the Association be responsible for moneys sent but in this way. Agents are not allowed to receive moneys, but must ask for checks, &c., &c. Persons paying an agent otherwise than by check do it at their own risk. All checks, &c., must be payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer. Accompanying the money must be a paper giving the applicant's full name, age, birth-place, present occupation, who the policy is in favor of, post-office address, town, county, state—also, a Medical Certificate, setting forth the physical condition, and whether, in the opinion of the doctor examining, the applicant is a proper person to be insured. Blank forms of application for membership will be sent upon application.

Agents are not allowed to receive money but in the form of a check, draft, or postal order, made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

Each member ought to try to make new members; by so doing he benefits himself. No letter will be noticed that does not contain a three-cent postage stamp to prepay return postage.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. We are now manufacturing Gents' and Ladies' Watches of extra fine finish and quality, price $20. These are equal in appearance and time to gold ones costing $200. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

[From the City Item, Philadelphia.]

THE OROIDE WATCHES.—A new metal, closely resembling gold, has been invented, of which watch-cases and watch-chains are made. C. E. Collins & Co., New York, are the manufacturers, and their advertisement will be found in another column. The Oroide Watches are in great demand. From all quarters of the Union, daily, hourly, come orders for one, two, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred watches. They are sold for only $15 each, and better time-keepers are not to be found. One of them has been going for a week in this office, and it is perfect in its movements. It looks as handsome, and keeps as good time as a watch costing $150. We advise all who are about to buy a watch to try the Oroide.

[From the La Crosse Republican.]

OROIDE WATCHES.—Out of curiosity, we called when in New York at the Watch Manufactory of Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., on Nassau Street, and confess our astonishment on being shown their assortment of watches. The cases made of this metal so closely resemble eighteen carat gold that we were puzzled to select a gold one placed amongst them. We should have no hesitation wearing one with full confidence that time would not change its appearance. Every watch is warranted, and the works are perfectly reliable and in all respects equal to a watch costing $150. We have no doubt that when once known in this section, many will be sent for.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

MESSRS. C. E. COLLINS & Co., of 37 and 39 Nassau St., are still further improving their beautiful Oroide Watches. These are excellent time-keepers, and for all practical purposes as good as a fine gold hunting-case watch.

[From the New York Independent.]

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to have good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who can not afford to pay a price of $40 or $60 for a first-class silver watch, nor $125 to $175 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. The Oroide Watch appears to suit their case exactly.

Citizens of Toronto and the Dominion generally, take notice. We have hundreds of Testimonials, for which, see our advertisements. But you need no further evidence than the following, from one who is well known among you. Here is his proof positive—

HARRY HAZLETON, the well-known author, says:

"I have always looked upon cheap watches as humbugs and dealers in them as little better than swindlers. At the request of a friend, I have worn for three months the watch he purchased of C. E. Collins, and for which he paid $15. It keeps accurate time, retains its perfect golden appearance, and I can really see no difference between it and my own, which cost five times the amount of the Collins Watch."

MR. HAZLETON adds:

"I have since purchased FIVE of these watches, at the request of friends, and those for whom they were intended are perfectly satisfied. Others are seeking for them, and I fancy that Mr. C. will find some difficulty in supplying the constantly-increasing demand."

☞ The regular price of the watch is $15, and others costing $20. These are superbly finished, and really superior to any article placed upon the market costing five times that sum.

OFFICE STATE CAPITAL REPORTER, 42 and 44 J Street, SACRAMENTO, CAL., July 15, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

Gentlemen: Wells, Fargo & Co. delivered Watch and Chain, as per order; paid bill on presentation. The Watch and Chain give entire satisfaction, and several of my friends wish the same quality of watch and chain. One is the chief editor of this paper, and two others are the publishers of this paper, and the others are for friends of mine, and by wearing your goods will make you a large sale in this city. I therefore wish you to send me seven watches and seven chains, of same quality as those you sent me, price paid you $15 for watch, and $6 currency for chain. I return you the guarantee; it may assist you in ascertaining the exact kind of goods sent me; the number of the watch sent is 66,982. If this order sent turns out as satisfactory as the first, we will give you a good editorial notice, and help you along as far as practicable. I send this order not for my benefit, but for yours and to accommodate my friends. Send to E. K. PHIPPS, Office of "State Capital Reporter," Sacramento, California.

Yours respectfully,
E. K. PHIPPS.

WATCH. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

Has the Summer enfeebled you?

Nine out of every ten to whom this question is addressed, if they answer it candidly, will answer it in the affirmative. Some may reply to it from a sick bed: others, of a stronger constitution and greater powers of endurance, may only experience a slight lassitude as the consequence of the torrid season. But some portion of the vitality of all human beings oozes out of them under the pressure of great and continuous heat, and the sooner the loss is completely repaired, the less susceptible will the system be to the unhealthy influence of the Fall malaria.

The most genial and wholesome tonic that has ever been offered to man—as a means of recruiting his exhausted strength, and fortifying him against the attacks of disease—is

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Taken at this season it is a perfect safeguard against intermittent fever, bilious affections, and all the epidemics which follow close upon the expiration of the Summer. It is an invigorant and alterative without any of the drawbacks which attach to mere stimulants, and is the only preparation of the kind which a conscientious physician would feel inclined to prescribe for ladies in delicate health. Nothing can be more pure, more harmless, more certain to restore the vigor of the system permanently and thoroughly, without exciting the pulse or the brain.

JAPANESE

HAIR STAIN
Changes the Whiskers, Moustache and Hair to a beautiful Black or Brown, without injury to the Hair or Skin. The Japanese Hair Stain, unlike a Hair Dye, consists of only one preparation; therefore no mixing or previous preparation of the hair, except washing, is required before applying the Stain, a deficiency long sought for and now first obtained.
After having applied the Stain; the hair does not require combing, as there is no sediment to be removed, as in the case with Hair Dyes. The color is more durable than that produced by any Hair Dye, as the sun improves it instead of causing it to fade, and the color cannot be removed by water.
Price, 50 cts. a box. Sent by mail, post-paid, for 75 cts.
Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 115 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia. Sold by all Druggists.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.
This Powder has been found highly beneficial and of great use to ladies who have been afflicted with superfluous hair, principally when its growth has been confined to the upper lip and side of the face, giving a masculine turn to the whole features. When used according to the directions, it will be found to be a great addition to the toilet, as the use of any sharp instrument is entirely avoided, and the hair is removed in five minutes after its application, without injury to the skin.
Price, $1 a bottle. Mailed to any address for $1.25.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 614.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE FAIR.

NEW HAMPSHIRE appears to have been the first State to hold her annual agricultural fair this year; and its unprecedented success indicates that these important exhibitions have a very strong hold on the public mind. For nearly a generation these agricultural fairs have been general in all the States; they were so firmly established at the beginning of the late war that their repetition each year of its existence was not interrupted, nor their temporary discontinuance even suggested. It is a pity, however, that exhibitions of this character are confined only to the agricultural and mechanical branches. In Europe almost every branch of manufactures—all the arts and the scientific associations—even the fishers, have regular exhibitions of this kind, calculated to incite to greater exertions and the production of finer qualities. There is no reason why similar exhibitions should not be arranged in this country.

The New Hampshire Fair opened on September 15, and continued, with great success, for four days. At least 20,000 persons were in attendance each day; and the various exhibitions of stock of various kinds were large and numerous, clearly showing an increased interest in the production of the best breeds of the various animals. We present on this page, as proof of the prevalence of this spirit, and as indicative of the progress which New Hampshire has made in stock-raising, portraits of several of the prize animals of this year's fair.

WE CAN'T SURRENDER NOW.

THE struggle was too fierce and long,
The cost in lives too dear—
Not yet forgotten are the braves
Who had no thought of fear;
They could not see the old flag torn
From Freedom's hallowed brow,
Nor can we lose what they bequeathed—
We can't surrender now!

While Hope is strong within the breast
Of ev'ry freeman true—
While Union's symbol proudly floats
In red and white and blue—
While God is just, and Might o'er Right
No victory will allow,
We will be true to Liberty—
We can't surrender now!

Then ask us not to vote for those
Who held our brave boys back,
When could come the Union's foes
With desolating track;
We can not blot the record fair
Of Freedom's holy vow,
We can not dim Truth's sacred light—
We can't surrender now!

THE BOYS ARE MARCHING ON.

OUR cause is the country for which Lincoln died,
As we go marching on.
The man of his choice is our leader and guide,
As we go marching on.
Three cheers for the Flag!
Grant and Colfax! Hurrah!
The boys are marching on!

We walk the same road that our brothers once trod,
As we go marching on,
Who gave their lives freely to freedom and God,
As we go marching on.
Three cheers for the Flag!
Grant and Colfax! Hurrah!
The boys are marching on!

Our goal is the Union redeemed and restored,
As we go marching on;
Reclaimed from her enemies—saved from the sword,
As we go marching on.
Three cheers for our Flag!
Grant and Colfax! Hurrah!
The boys are marching on!

We've glorious news from the Pine-tree State,
As we go marching on.
Soon her sisters will speak, we have not long to wait,
As we go marching on.
Three cheers for the Flag!
Grant and Colfax! Hurrah!
The boys are marching on!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1868.

THE SITUATION.

THE campaign is now so far advanced that its chances may be intelligibly perceived and discussed. The remarkable result in Maine and Vermont shows that the apparent reaction of last year is over, and that the issue of the election is fairly understood by the country. The feeling and purpose of the Southern Democratic leaders have been fully revealed both in their speeches and newspapers, and in the action of the Georgia Legislature, and that of the Democratic Club. A country torn with the struggle of a long and fearful war is asked whether it will trust its safety and tranquillity to desperate men. It is asked whether, under the plea of attempting to lighten taxation, it will call to power those who imposed the necessity of taxes. It is asked to forget history, to repudiate experience, and to disregard all the principles and laws which usually govern human conduct. In the height of its civilization it is asked to recur to the brute methods of barbarism, and to overthrow by force the policy which has been established by law, and which, if inexpedient or unjust, the regular process of law can remedy.

To these astounding propositions the country begins to give its answer, and an answer that is overwhelming. Indeed, there should have been no doubt of the result from the day on which the Democratic Convention declared for repudiation, for overthrowing reconstruction by force, and nominating Mr. SEYMOUR and General BLAIR as the special favorites of the Rebel rebels in the war. To suppose that the people would deliberately prefer such a policy to one of honor and fidelity and justice; that at this juncture it would prefer HORATIO SEYMOUR to General GRANT, and FRANK BLAIR, madly flourishing a sword, to SCHUYLER COLFAX, was to suppose that it was a people lost to all consciousness of the conditions of national perpetuity and prosperity. If the tragedy of such a result had not been unspeakable, its comedy would have been indescribable. We should have presented the spectacle of a nation attacked by domestic enemies and finally subduing them in the field, and immediately falling a victim to the arts against which we had been distinctly warned in the moment of victory.

The nakedness of the issue would undoubtedly have been avoided by some of the astuter men of the Democratic party. They favored a cattle-fish policy. They desired to darken counsel. They knew that their only hope lay in confusion, and if they could wrap the issue in a cloud the result would be less certain. But such men are seldom the real directors of a party. They go before and are conspicuous; but they are only figure-heads upon the prow, while the guiding force is the unseen rudder at the stern. "I have seen — and — said," said a Democratic politician from the interior of the State, "and they want to nominate CHASE. That is just the miserable, compromising, shilly-shally policy which has kept us out in the cold for seven years. There can't be any compromise between right and wrong. I don't want to stand in the minority of a single vote, but my end of the line and give you Republicans a square pull." This man represented the faith of his party. He had some real feeling, some actual conviction. So had FORNEY and WADE HAMPTON and all the repudiation Copperheads, and they controlled the Convention.

It is to the men of conviction in the Democratic party that we owe the simplicity of the campaign. WADE HAMPTON, for instance, is in earnest. He wants power not for the sake of the Democratic party, not for the sake of the Constitution or of the Union, but for the ascendency of his political principles and the consequent final success of his purpose, which is absolute State sovereignty or dissolution of the Union. He calls for the old Union. What was the old Union? It was a system of government in which he and his friends were dominant. Slavery, the source of his power, was made the law of the land. Of course he had no wish to go out of the Union if he could maintain his dominion. But the only moment thus policy was threatened he tried to destroy the Union. Defeated in that course he thinks he sees a chance of recovering power in the Union, so he shouts lustily for the "old Union," that is to say, the Union in which he and his policy were the rulers. Here is a man with a distinct political philosophy. And ROBERT TOOMBS is another, and HOWELL COBB another. And they of necessity are the men who control the party with which they act rather than men who have no particular principle or purpose except patronage, place, and the excitement of the game.

Had Mr. CHASE been nominated the issue would not have been really changed, although it would have been obscured, and positive results deferred. Had he been elected, he would have been chosen by a party with very few principles he disagreed; for the Democratic party, as a party, is sincerely opposed to equal suffrage, while Mr. CHASE, as a man, is sincerely in favor of it. To reward his services would mean nothing. To have called his election a triumph of moderation over extremes, would have been equally unmeaning. It would be nothing but an extreme view of the situation possible. Either the nation has nothing whatever to say upon the subject of reconstruction, or it has every thing. The Democratic party has a very essential point to the late rebel States, or it must be regulated in those points by Congress. There has been no other question since the fall of the rebellion, and every election has been on the other view. Mr. CHASE's election could only have helped the solution in the degree that he favored the Democratic party. To say that it would have secured a peaceful overthrow of the new State organizations, is to forget that the party which would have elected him would have hated those organizations as much as it does now—would have believed them revolutionary and void—and, flushed with victory, would have demanded their destruction.

If we regard the result as a foregone conclusion, it is not because we forget how absolutely essential the most energetic labor is. GENERAL GRANT was elected by a great majority in October—and that is not that a constitutional majority wishes his election, but that it votes for it. Without the most thorough organization, it will not vote. Without the most continuous and vigorous agitation, it will not feel the necessity of voting. Maine and Vermont were totally carried because every vote was fully aroused and organized. "On this day," said one of the most valuable soldiers who gave his life to baffle WADE HAMPTON and FORREST—"on this day every regiment must do the duty of a brigade."

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON PLAYING WITH EDGED TOOLS.

WHEN Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON was appointed Minister to England we took occasion to object, not to his personal character or capacity, for Mr. JOHNSON is a man of acknowledged ability, but because he was not really a representative Democrat. Mr. JOHNSON does not understand the change that has taken place in this country and of which the abolition of slavery is merely a sign. He would not sympathize with it, and consequently he is sure to make mistakes when he is forced to talk about it. There is probably quite as much political liberality of thought among intelligent Englishmen as there is in this country. They know quite as well as we the nature of the relations that ought to exist between us. They understand that liberal men there and here are the trustees of political progress, and are really united to resist all forms of dangerous action. They sometimes estimate their political adversaries just as we do ours. They know that the English influence which encouraged the rebellion in this country is the enemy of England as much as of the United States, and the men who represented that influence are as distasteful to the English liberals as the Copperheads of the war are to us.

Mr. JOHNSON, in view of all these facts, begins his mission by a huge blunder. He goes to a public dinner at Sheffield, which was one of the most unfriendly cities during the war. That, however, was not a blunder, for he had an opportunity of saying some timely things and of courteously informing the cutlers that if they could have had their way six years ago he certainly could not have been their guest now, as the Government to be represented would have ceased to exist. This opportunity, of course, Mr. JOHNSON did not improve. But his mistake was yet further to come. At this dinner Lord WHARNCLIFFE was also a guest; and Mr. LAIRD's name was received with cheers; and when Mr. JOHNSON replies to the toast in honor of his country, the representative of a victorious and regenerated nation blandly informs the rebel-sympathizing city of Sheffield that the name of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, the President of the Southern Association, a society of blockade-runners and Anglo-rebel pirates during the war, ought to be dear to every American. We do not add that of LAIRD? JOHN BRIGHT, JOHN STUART MILL, GOLDWIN SMITH, Professor CAIRNES, and their friends are not to be named, but Lord WHARNCLIFFE is the first to be remembered. That was no occasion especially to name Mr. BRIGHT, but there was every reason not to mention WHARNCLIFFE. Mr. JOHNSON is mistaken. Lord WHARNCLIFFE's name is odious to Americans.

It was not surprising that after such a speech from the American Minister, Mr. ROEBUCK, one of the bitterest foes of America and one of the most foolish of Englishmen, should have vented his spleen against us. Mr. ROEBUCK is one of those men who will never forgive us for not having succumbed to the rebellion; and he enjoyed peculiar satisfaction in insulting us in the presence of our minister. Nor ROEBUCK is merely a Parliamentary Tory. He and his remarks are of no possible importance to us or to England. He should, therefore, have been disregarded, or he should have been answered effectively and truly. Mr. JOHNSON, however, took care to answer defensively upon the next day, and to state what is hardly true. But Mr. JOHNSON does not affect more injuriously the general character of the people of this country. We are disposed to think, indeed, that it would be found to have been one of the most serious perplexities of our political development.

Mr. JOHNSON's remarks upon the beautiful harmony of feeling that exists between England and this country were not new, and they are not true. It is undoubtedly true that the language of the Bible, of SHAKESPEARE, and of MILTON, is common to us both, and that a common language is a persuasive spell of friendly union. But it is no less true that the action of the British Government before, during, and after the revolution did very much to paralyze that spell, and that the soothing work of Time was rudely undone by the British official attitude and general sympathy during the rebellion. Every sensible and liberal Englishman perceives the crime against mankind of any willful effort to excite hostility between America and England; but the warning of the deputation only shows the depth of the consciousness of irritation. It is a feeling which every generous American shares; and the sense of the deputation only shows that both countries is to promote the best mutual understanding. But we must not pretend that the two nations are sincere friends; and we do not believe that Mr. JOHNSON has done a real service in treating the subject with such rosy rhetoric.

We doubt, however, if the Master Cutler and the Worshipful Company took Mr. JOHNSON's amiable periods in any other than a Pickwickian sense. And yet, if they believed him when he said that Lord WHARNCLIFFE's name ought to be dear to us, why not when he said that we were gushing with love for our English brethren?

FIGHTING AGAIN.

MR. FREDERICK ROBINSON, Brevet Captain United States Army, writes to us from Barrancas Barracks, Pensacola Harbor, Florida: "It will not do to underrate the vigor of those who gave us so much trouble for the space of four years, and who will fight again if the thing is badly forced upon them." Captain ROBINSON proposes to avoid such a fight by surrender. He says that for us he "will simply write the word 'Succumb,' and dispose for himself," "I shall most certainly support the SEYMOUR and BLAIR ticket." We observe that upon a previous date Captain ROBINSON had written to the Nation advocating a mild repudiation. We are not surprised, therefore, that, favoring submission to the threats of Messrs. HAMPTON and TOOMBS, and willing to refuse to pay the cost of suppressing the first rebellion of those gentlemen, he warmly supports SEYMOUR and BLAIR.

His argument is that Florida is now subjected to negro rule. He does not say, indeed, that such is actually the case; that the State officers are of the colored race, for they are not. But he urges that every office is held at the sufferance of the colored voters. The answer to the remarks of Captain ROBINSON is found in the reply of the colored voters of South Carolina to the same kind of remarks offered by the supporters of SEYMOUR and BLAIR in that State. The difficulty is in itself wholly imaginary, and becomes real only by the conduct of persons like Captain ROBINSON, who take leave of common-sense in dealing with the colored vote, as Englishmen apparently lose their wits when they treat of Ireland. All that is necessary is ordinary humanity and commonsense. The prejudice of which Captain ROBINSON speaks we do not deny. But we have paid quite decent attention to the subject, and if the question becomes practical whether the country shall continue to yield to the prejudice of the most dangerous class in it or fight again, we commend to Captain ROBINSON his own word, "beware."

The number of the colored population of the Southern States is perhaps four millions; that of the whites is probably eleven millions. The disfranchised whites do not seriously disturb the proportion of voters. In four of the ten rebel States the negro voters are more ordered than white voters; but the white registry by no means represents the qualified voters, but those only who chose to register. It probably will be found, however will attain that General LONGSTREET knows "the South" quite as well as a Northern officer; he knows the politicians and the people; and General LONGSTREET says of "negro supremacy" what the figures show and human nature suggests: "It is silly to think of it. They can never be stronger than they are to-day, and the wisdom of the South know it; but they are misled by the politicians."

But suppose that the case were otherwise; that, instead of being a small minority of the population, the colored voters were a majority. Captain ROBINSON probably calls himself a Democrat. Does he mean to say that he holds to the wise policy of reconstruction in the State of Florida—to reorganize the government by politically subjecting the loyal majority to the disloyal minority, by making a party, or to confer political power upon all, with temporary exceptions of peculiarly dangerous persons? The Captain must remember that the first practical question of government is safety—and that if a man like WADE HAMPTON is dangerous because of his hostility to loyal colored voting, he would be a hundredfold more dangerous if loyal colored voting were suppressed to gratify him. The Captain says that "it is dangerous to run counter to prejudices." Nothing is truer; but prejudices, as is very single. It is not merely whether Mr. WADE HAMPTON and his friends shall be held in check by a loyal vote, or whether they shall have full swing for their purposes? But Captain ROBINSON thinks that Mr. HAMPTON is anxious to be a loyal citizen, and only waits to have his prejudices appeased before he comes in. We, on the other hand, think that he and his class and their principles are fatal to the American Union and liberty. In a word, our correspondent would hope for peace by putting the Government at the feet of their late masters. He might as wisely pour alcohol on his fire to quench it. We hope for peace in the present condition of the country only by the strictest regard to the national honor, and by the maintenance of political equality. If the alternative be the surrender of the loyal majority to the will of their color to their deadly enemies, who are also at heart enemies of the Union, or war, Captain ROBINSON must instinctively know which course any wise and honorable nation would choose.

FORREST AND FORT PILLOW.

GENERAL N. B. FORREST, one of the most notorious of the rebel soldiers, and a conspicuous delegate to the SEYMOUR and BLAIR Convention, is very busily engaged in explaining away former speeches and declarations, and since the war. General FORREST is associated with the Fort Pillow massacre very much as Captain WINZ was with Andersonville. He was the responsible commanding officer, and in a recent conversation which has been reported he speaks of the false stories of the capture of Fort Pillow as having furnished a pretext for illustration in this paper. He then proceeds to give his version.

Fort Pillow, it will be remembered, was half garrisoned with negro troops. The rebel government had already resolved not to treat colored soldiers or their white officers as prisoners of war. Three weeks before the attack upon Fort Pillow FORREST had summoned Paducah, saying to Colonel HICKS, "If I have to storm your works you may expect no quarter." The day after the massacre at Fort Pillow, BUFORD, FORREST's lieutenant, summoned Columbus, and said to the commander, Colonel LAURENCE, "Should I be compelled to take the place by force no quarter will be shown negro troops whatever." This was the spirit of the rebel government, of FORREST, and of his men. The attack resulted in the capture, and, having driven the garrison into the fort, he demanded a surrender within twenty minutes. During this time his men, under the flag of truce, crept into better positions. At the end of twenty minutes FORREST's force instantly overran the fort. The garrison flung down their arms and fled down the bank to the river, the rebels following and butchering.

The facts are sustained by the amplest and most incontrovertible evidence; both white and black witnesses declaring that the rebels declared constantly that they shot the blacks because they were "niggers," and the whites because "they were fighting with niggers." And FORREST, in his very attempt to exculpate himself, confesses that his men refused to leave Tennessee until Fort Pillow was destroyed; that the feeling of his troops was such that he could not be responsible for the fate of the garrison; that many of his men had been "wronged," and shot down the wrong-doers without delay; and "the result was only natural in war."

That there was a massacre FORREST does not attempt to deny. That the rebel authorities meant to kill all negroes taken in arms is indisputable. But FORREST's own especially hated the garrison of Fort Pillow he confesses. That he had summoned Paducah to expect no quarter, and his lieutenant Columbus to the same terms, is of record. And, while he now denies that he knew of any refusal of quarter there are many witnesses who distinctly testify to his presence and command during the slaughter. FORREST must be aware that his mere statement at this time can not change the public verdict upon the massacre of Fort Pillow.

GEN. BUTLER IN MASSACHUSETTS.

THE action of the late Massachusetts Republican Convention was marked by the good sense of the National Convention at Chicago. It declared in the most concise and distinct terms for the payment of the debt in gold, and nominated for Governor Mr. CLAFLIN, the present Lieutenant-Governor, and Chairman of the Republican National Committee—a man universally trusted and respected. The proceedings of the Convention were interesting also, as showing the total want of influence in the counsels of the party of General BUTLER. This is a very significant fact; for while the personal services during the war are gratefully acknowledged, his entire unfitness as a party leader and representative are not less obvious. And if, as we believe, the Republican party is not to be intrusted with the Government, it is absolutely essential that it should be free from the responsibility of connection with which General BUTLER is peculiarly identified.

The General is, however, an adroit and not a sensitive man, as the story of the Convention shows. From the reports in the papers, excepting the Springfield Republican, a reader might suppose that he controlled the Convention and were the leading Republican in Massachusetts. The truth is that he was utterly defeated at every point, and that there is no conspicuous man of less weight in the party. The General went to Worcester hoping to secure the nomination of his friend, Dr. LORING, for Governor. The Doctor lives in Essex County, into which the General moved two years since to insure an election to Congress, and it was understood that the Doctor would have liked the Congressional nomination at that time but withdrew for his friend. The Doctor was a Democrat of the extreme school until the year 1862 or 1863, and bitterly opposed the war in the beginning, so that the Republicans, while acknowledging his ability and his faithful service since he joined them, could not feel that, just at this time, and with the issues of the national campaign, he was a suitable candidate for Governor of Massachusetts. Again the General thought he was, and went to the Convention to prove it to the delegates.

When he arrived, however, it was really a foregone conclusion. But on the evening before the Convention met he spoke in a caucus of the delegates, and claimed that the Doctor should be elected as a remarkably good Republican, on the ground that he did not inherit his principles, but adopted them deliberately and conscientiously. This was a strong point of the General. That a clever and aspiring man should join a party which had sixty or eighty thousand sure majority might not be surprising; but that he was the evidence of the purity of principle, was a suggestion that had the charm of novelty. It adorned the eleventh-hour saints with a lustre hale than ever, and the General must have greatly enjoyed his own speech. When he had spoken, MR. R. H. DANA, Jun., was called upon by the caucus, and after remarking upon the general national issues, he passed to the politics of the State. MR. DANA said that he supposed the candidate was already evident, and he described MR. CLAFLIN in a few striking phrases, without mentioning his name, as a man who was an anti-slavery man when it cost something to be so, as a Free Soiler when it was a small and despised party. Then he turned to General BUTLER, and said that he did not suppose the distinguished gentleman, in expressing a preference for a candidate who had recently joined the party, meant to express any disapprobation of those who had been right from the beginning. To this most trenchant thrust the General could only answer, "Not if they will stick." And MR. DANA had only to ask the delegates whether the friend of truth and the dark day was likely to desert her in the hour of health and power, to touch the heart and mind of his audience, and show the General that his cause was lost.

He was much too shrewd not to see it. So the next day, when the Convention was about to ballot for a candidate, the General rose. He was called to the platform. "Why," said he in substance, "why go through a useless form? One man is in all hearts and upon all lips. Let us nominate Mr. CLAFLIN by acclamation." It was exquisitely adroit, and as great bodies of men are generous when they have their own way, and always admire pluck and good-humor, the Convention felt very kindly toward the General. But it did not yield an inch. He wanted Doctor LORING. The Convention nominated MR. CLAFLIN by acclamation. He had made an urgent appeal that nothing should be said about paying the bonds. The Convention demanded gold and silver. But having compelled the General to withdraw his candidate upon the ground that he could not carry him, and having passed the coin resolution against his entreaty, it was satisfied to leave MR. ATKINSON's admirable and sensible speech upon the finances to be printed, and so adjourned.

General BUTLER went to Worcester for two objects, the nomination of Dr. LORING and silence upon the payment of the bonds. He was so powerless that he lost both without even a struggle. But the good-humored Convention allowed him what he said what they liked, and the good-humored papers, omitting the details of his utter defeat, left him amidst the cheers as a victor. But history and the character of the party record how the truth should be known. The Massachusetts Republicans utterly repudiate the financial principles and the State policy of General BUTLER.

THE OLD ARMY.

IN his amusing reply to General ROSECRANS, General LEE informs us that it is a sad slander to say that the late rebels are hostile to the colored citizens. Have we not always lived together? says the rebel. Have we not our interests of necessity the same? Events are terribly sarcastic, General. Scarcely had he written his touching sentences when the Georgia colored members were expelled from the Legislature and from the jury-box, and could SEYMOUR and BLAIR only be elected, the entire Black Code would be re-enacted. The old Mammy argument, General LEE ought to know, is exhausted. We used to hear of that personage and of the lovely relations existing between master and servant upon the old-old days of the Union-as-it-was with paddles and blood-hounds, with MR. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS catching fugitive slaves in Boston, and MR. CHARLES O'CONOR acting to enforce the slave-laws of Virginia made paramount in New York.

In 1792, when WILBERFORCE called the attention of British Parliament to the atrocities of the slave-trade, and especially of the middle passage, the General LEES of the time, who were the slave-owners and traders, urged, like old Mammy reminiscences, that the passage, they declared, was truly delightful. The hold of the ship, it somewhat warm, was exactly adapted to the tropical constitution of the beloved Africans; and it was the solicitation of their spirits in the stimulating sea air that every night they made merry upon deck and danced their native dances. They begged with more beautiful and touching, and nothing so devoid of hostility, said the General LEES of the day, than the relation between the races upon the plantations. The middle passage question it was discovered that the accommodations of the hold were a space of five feet and a half by nine feet and seven inches for each man—the height between decks was four feet five feet and eight inches; the victims were chained by their hands and feet to ring-bolts and packed upon shelves. They were fed twice a day, once hours a day, and were then compelled under the lash to jump about the deck in their chains. These were the tropical accommodations and the national dances. General LEE may see here a beautiful illustration of the force of words. And the reader has only to read the General's defense, and the Georgia and South Carolina legislation to enjoy the same gratification.

"The idea," writes the mellifluous General "the grand old soldier," as the World fondly calls him—"the idea that the Southern people are hostile to the negroes, and would oppress them if it were in their power to do so, is entirely unfounded. The negroes are quiet, peaceable, and orderly people, and have been accustomed from childhood to look upon them with kindness." Nothing but tropical luxury, merriment, and national dances, you see. To be sure, if General LEE and General HAMPTON and General BLAIR can have their way, the colored citizens must not vote; nor have arms; nor sit upon juries; nor have control of their children; nor work at any trade without written permission; nor learn to read or write; nor own land; nor trade without a license; nor be other than enchised, disarmed, disgraced, and degraded, but it is idle to talk of hostility: they have grown up in our midst; and haven't we all had old black mammies?

Formerly the Black policy of General LEE and his friends was the most infamous system of slavery ever known. Their present policy is the absolute degradation of a third of the population of the Southern States into a condition as near that slavery as possible. In this the policy of justice, of humanity, of common honor, or prosperity and peace? Is this the policy which the nation that emancipated those slaves proposes to support? Maine and Vermont say, "No; we are for GRANT, COLFAX, and PEACE." Shall say Pennsylvania and Indiana and Ohio? Are they for SEYMOUR, BLAIR, and anarchy?—for the tropical pleasures, the merriment, and national dances of the Black codes?

THE SAME OLD STORY.

THE Democratic Committee of Pennsylvania have issued a congratulatory address upon the Republican victory in Maine. It begins with these words: "The sturdy Democracy of Maine have covered themselves with glory."

After BEAUREGARD's disastrous defeat by GRANT at Shiloh, and the reckless retreat which he begged BRECKINRIDGE, who commanded the rear-guard, not to suffer "to be converted into a rout," the foolish Booty and Beauty BEAUREGARD telegraphed to Richmond that he "had gained a great and glorious victory."

The kind of victory that the rebels won at Shiloh compelled LEE's surrender to GRANT. The kind of triumph in Maine, over which the Democrats rejoice, will bring SEYMOUR to the same little ceremony.

THAT LEG.

We are glad to inform the kind subscribers for a new leg for CHARLES BERKELEY, whose case we stated some time ago, that it is made and has been worn most satisfactorily for some time. GRAHAM, HAWKS & GRAHAM, 319 Canal Street, New York, have furnished one of their raw-hide legs, "as good as could be made for a Major-General." Their leg has received the most unqualified approval from the most distinguished surgeons. Dr. CARNOCHAN says that, from its greater lightness and more durable material, the leg is likely to supersede other inventions of a similar character. Dr. MARCH and Dr. ARMSBY of Albany consider that it is "the most perfect and best calculated for the use of amputees of any artificial limb" of all that they know. Dr. QUACKENBUSH, State Surgeon-General in 1864, agrees with them. We have seen also many certificates from soldiers and others most warmly attesting the comfort and general excellence of the MONROE leg. The makers furnish them to soldiers for seventy-five dollars, and we can assure any one who may apply to them that he can hardly fail to be satisfied with their work, and that he will be treated with the utmost courtesy and consideration.

A VOICE FROM ANDERSONVILLE.

A GENTLEMAN who lately passed through Andersonville, Georgia, upon a train with a company of United States soldiers, writes us: "The train stopped at the graveyards, and I went forward through the cars the men were in; and oh! how I wished that POMEROY and SEYMOUR could have heard the expressions of these soldiers of five years! There before us, on that sun-burnt hill, was the prison pen, and each plank of its black stockade seemed to grin at us with the horrors it had seen and caused. I should like to see a picture of that stockade, and on the left the United States Cemetery with the Stars and Stripes flying over the poor boys' graves. I think it would clench the nail in the political coffin of SEYMOUR and BLAIR."

CARPET-BAGGERS.

ONE of the most ringing speeches of the campaign was that of General SICKLES to the Boys in Blue on the anniversary of the battle of Antietam. He gave the following admirable historical survey of carpet-baggers:

"My friends, there are several kinds of carpet-bag-gers we have seen in this country within the past few years. The rebels have had their share of carpet-baggers here to New York during the war. (Laughter.) Jefferson, a green carpet-bag now. (Laughter.) BRICK POMEROY is a carpet-bagger. (Applause and laughter.) The Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, MR. BELMONT, is a carpet-bagger from the Rhine. (Laughter and applause.) Corporation Counsel O'GORMAN is a very fair specimen of the carpet-baggers from old Ireland, who have taken possession of the City Government. (Laughter), and if O'GORMAN's carpet-bag is not full yet, it must be a very big one, or else he has failed to profit by his opportunities, which no one suspects. (Renewed laughter and applause.) And then there is DENNIS SEYMOUR, the carpet-bagger of the rebellion, who wanders over Europe with or without a carpet-bag, seeking for consolation. (Great laughter.) But our Northern carpet-baggers belong to a somewhat different race. The whole West was peopled by a race of carpet-baggers. WILLIAM PENN was a carpet-bagger of the right sort. DANIEL BOONE, of Kentucky, LEWIS CASS, of Michigan, STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS (Applause), of Illinois; they were all carpet-baggers. And you find that our country, North, East, and West, has been peopled by an emigration of carpet-baggers. (Applause.) The May Flower brought a colony of carpet-baggers (Applause) and landed them on the shores of New England. WILLIAM THE Conqueror took some Norman carpet-baggers over to England, and captured the Saxon carpets, and founded a nation that has enrich they own, or propose to own. (Laughter.) Our great-grandfathers came here in search of religious and enterprise wherever they go, and they are not to be hurled out or excluded from the South at rebel dictation."

"UNTO THIS LAST."

FOR "such as these have lived and died,"
Oh, saddest comment on the pride
That would limit their fame!

"Have lived and died" since Adam's day;
Will live and die while human clay
Shall Nature's changeless laws obey.

LOVE, with its passionate embrace,
Ne'er held the treasure in its place;
It went the way of all the race.

FEAR never kept the victim back,
For at the moment of attack
The Shadow over swept the track.

PRAYER never yet its power could bring
To stay the Angel when his wing
Unfolded for the harvesting.

FAITH, though it came in purest guise,
Could only watch its pleadings rise
With the smoke of the sacrifice.

TEARS, though they like a river run,
Have never yet the Victory won;
The end to all comes as to one.

No plea avails—"these lived and died;"
No plea avails—across the tide
We reach at last "the other side."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Louisiana Senate has decided that there shall be no personal distinctions in railroad cars, steamboats, or other public resort, except those of sex.

A terrible conflagration is raging in the forests of Oregon and California. The fire is estimated to have already spread over an area of two hundred square miles. The friends of the Central Pacific Railroad, it is feared that the towns of St. Helena and Astoria will be destroyed. A tract of five miles of woods near San Rafael, Marin County, California, is on fire, the flames from which completely enveloped the harbor and city of San Francisco.

CAPTAIN, OF Dublin, arrived in New York on September 17 from the Arctic regions, and gives some interesting particulars of HALL'S Polar Expedition. Captain Hall has ascertained definitely the circumstances of the death of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN and the survivors of Sir John Franklin's party. Captain Crozier and a number of the crew of the vessels Erebus and Terror, Sandy-stanton Island. Captain Crozier's watch and other articles of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN's are on board, and he was to start in February or March last with an armed party of sledges to the Fish River to recover some records left by Franklin's men in King William's land.

The building of the taxpayers of Mount Vernon, New York, was held in that village on September 19, to consider another proposition for improvements in the roads, cross-walks, etc. Before any vote was taken a petition was offered from one hundred citizens of the village, demanding the right to vote on the question by those only who had paid their tax-bills, or was quoted to show that they were not qualified, before the meeting could proceed on the business. During the proceedings one lady asked permission to vote, and spoke in behalf of herself and the rest of the tax-payer, who had just entered the room, but she was promptly voted down. The Rev. Mr. Wright then arose and said that several ladies had deputed him to represent them as they were hooted down with cries of "Put him out." Two gentlemen then took the ladies' part, and they, too, were hooted down, and the ladies left in a body for the present.

The Alabama Legislature has asked the President for Federal troops to preserve the peace.

A riot occurred in Camilla, Georgia, on September 18, between blacks and whites of opposite parties. A Republican meeting was dispersed by some one, and the fight became general; but the colored people were driven and badly beaten. The Sheriff of the county was of them being killed and wounded. Colonel Pierce, the Republican candidate for Congress, and Captain Murphy, an ex-Bureau agent, were seriously injured.

On the second, then called on the charge of conspiracy, but was postponed at the request of counsel for the defendant. In order to enter a special plea setting forth the amnesty proclamation as a bar to trial.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE fear of a great war in Europe appears to be spreading all over Europe; and well-informed men predict that the present year will witness its terrible commencement. The apprehension is unquestionably created by the governments and peoples of Europe, without one exception, and in the European mind, whose purpose is unknown, and perhaps undetermined. A feeling of insecurity and uncertainty has given rise to a guilty or indecisive.

RUSSIA has assailed the American-German naturalization treaty.

THE Spanish mails of Spain lately sought, and, in spite of her very limonrol reputation, obtained an interview with LORD CLARENDON. It was said that the fear for the purpose of asking him to entrust her against her established principles of the people. Napoleon is to have refused. Evidently the decision was a wise one, as since the interview we have the intelligence of the revolt of the Spanish fleet, the return of many exiled generals and statesmen, the rising in the large seven towns, and the panic of the Court at Madrid. The abdication of the Queen is rumored, and the resignation of the principal officers of her Cabinet is officially announced. A general movement against the Queen, headed by General PRIM, has, undoubtedly, been begun.

On August 13, the day of the earthquakes on the Pacific coast of South America, a terrible storm was experienced at Buenos Ayres on the Atlantic slope. It was almost unprecedented in violence, and that has occurred there for some time. Numerous vessels were driven in the harbor, and several houses were blown down.

TRIAL AND CONVICTION OF THE ASSASSIN WHELAN.

EVEN since the assassination of President LINCOLN the use of the pistol for political purposes has been more frequent both in this and in other countries. From BOOTH Southern politicians of the Democratic persuasion learned a lesson, which they have not been slow to improve. BOOTH may have and probably did act from a selfish motive—ambition, notoriety or half the horrid net of murder which he could not gain by other means: aiming at the highest possible victim, he gained the broadest reach of infamy. But the lesson which he illustrated, the fact which he made patent to all reckless politicians and scoundrels in the country, was that assassination might be made the means of political terrorism. A President might be elected by a majority the threat overthrowing; but still the well-aimed pistol or the secret dagger would baffle the purposes of that majority. A king or queen might be supported by the popular will against all the machinery of an opposition acting by fair means; but the act of murder—concealed or unconcealed, according to the recklessness of the assassin—would defeat the popular will. This was BOOTH'S lesson to the impatient, to the turbulent, to the reckless citizens of his own land and of all others.

His teaching has impressed itself, as we have already intimated, upon those in the South who would still defend the "lost cause." "All is not lost," they repeat after MILTON'S Satan: we may still gain by moral terrorism, by threatened starvation, or by actual murder, what we lost in a fair and open conflict with the forces of a great nation. The number of murders now committed in a single South-ern State during the period of a single year, for political reasons, is astounding. And when we consider that, in addition to actual murder, the menace of starvation reaches a much larger number of men, women, and children, dependent for their very chance of labor upon those who make these menaces, can we come to any other conclusion than that BOOTH'S infamous deed has had its full effect in the South? The threat recently made by a Democratic journal in Mobile that, if all else fails, there is still resort to the dagger of a BRUTUS, confirms us in this conclusion. Is this confirmation weakened when a New York Democratic paper is audacious enough to present to its readers a representation of BOOTH, the assassin, as a saint in Paradise, and of our true LINCOLN as a victim writhing in the torments of hell?

The Servian assassination is another illustration of the effect of BOOTH'S infamous murder. The Fenian Order has also caught the intimations thus spread over the world. It has made attacks productive of useless loss of life. It has blown up prisons filled with inmates innocent of the enormous crime of murder; and it has done this from simple malice against the Government of Great Britain, which had imprisoned these victims. This order has been intoxicated with the sentiment of murder. It has through one of its members, or one of its sympathizers and pupils, what matter which?, attempted the murder of an English Prince. In Canada, on the morning of the 7th of April last, one WHELAN, who, if not belongs to this order, evidently sympathized with its purposes, assassinated D'ARCY M'GEE, a member of the Canadian Administration and a prominent advocate of the Confederation.

In all cases which we have mentioned the assassins have utterly failed of accomplishing the objects they had in view. BOOTH killed LINCOLN, but he failed to paralyze the Government, as he had designed. The murderers of negroes and white Unionists in the New Orleans riots of 1866 only strengthened the hands of the Government. And every murder of Celtic origin in the North since the close of the war has had precisely the same effect. The Servian assassins only accomplished exactly what they strove to prevent—the succession in regular order of the royal line in that province. And, reflecting upon this circumstance, the Emperor NAPOLEON very properly said that assassination for political purposes could never accomplish the purposes of the assassins. If, said he, I should be cut off by the dagger of a BRUTUS, it would insure the perpetuation of my line through the Prince Imperial, and even if the latter were assassinated the French people would seek the nearest of kin as successor to the throne.

The Fenian organization has not been less foolish in its violence; nor have its attempts to accomplish political ends by assassination been less futile. Its turbulence has only arrayed against it the decency of the whole civilized world.

The midnight murder of THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE was a dastardly act, which aroused the indignation of all sober men. The citizens of the United States looked upon it as a repetition in some sort of the infamous murder of LINCOLN. It is fitting, therefore, that we should give prominence to the trial of the assassin, and hold him up to the detestation of all. The case can not be considered as purely foreign to us; the considerations which we have already introduced make it one which nearly concerns ourselves.

THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE was a representative of Montreal in the Canadian Parliament. On the evening of April 6 he had spoken until a late hour of the night. His address is said to have been one of the most eloquent speeches ever heard in the Chamber. At about half past two o'clock he retired to his lodgings in the house of a person named TROTTER. As he was opening the door an assassin came behind him, and shot him through the back of the neck, the ball passing out through his mouth, and carrying away some of his teeth. Within a few seconds he fell, dead. These are the simple facts of the murder. But a person had appeared at Mr. M'GEE'S house some weeks before, and had been admitted by Mr. M'GEE'S brother. This person alleged that his errand was of a friendly nature, namely, to give intelligence that the house would be fired at 4 A.M. that morning. He was therefore admitted into the library. There was a strong political feeling existing in the city of Montreal, and the animosity between the two contending parties had reached a high pitch of excitement, one of which was led by Mr. M'GEE, and the other by Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. M'GEE therefore gave his visitor a note to take to the police, informing them of the projected incendiarism. This was at about 2 A.M. The note did not reach the police until 4.45 A.M. This circumstance, together with the fact that WHELAN had been heard to use violent language against Mr. M'GEE, led to the suspicion that he was the murderer.
